Presentation of a Newly Discovered Manuscript of La Boétie’s Discours de la servitude volontaire and Hypotheses on the Datation of the BnF Manuscripts

Marc Schachter

In the collections of the Folger Shakespeare Library in Washington, DC is a French manuscript miscellany, shelf mark Vb. 49, with the words “Melange de pieces” written on the spine of its original, late sixteenth-century sheepskin binding. The documents bound in the codex are not themselves “originals” but rather duplicates copied into it. They include, among other texts, a treatise on the distribution of ecclesiastical authority between the French monarch and the pope followed by a related discussion of punishments and jurisdictional issues for different categories of malefactors; poems by Catherine Desroches; speeches delivered to the Queen Mother and to Henri III by various regional authorities; a letter and a speech concerning the possible marriage of Queen Elizabeth of England to the Duc d’Anjou; letters from Elizabeth herself to Henri III and to the Queen Mother on the subject of Michel de Castelnau, ambassador to England; letters from Henri III of Navarre to the Parliament of Paris and to the Faculty of Theology of the Sorbonne; a copy in French of the will of Michel de L'Hospital; and, from fol. 44r to fol. 60v, a heretofore unidentified copy of Étienne de La Boétie’s Discours de la Servitude volontaire.¹

As this intriguing list of documents suggests, Vb. 49 merits a comprehensive analysis. My remarks in this essay will, however, be focused on the copy of the Servitude volontaire contained in it and on the four sixteenth- and seventeenth century manuscripts of La Boétie’s treatise held at the Bibliothèque nationale de France. After describing the Folger manuscript, I turn to a dispute concerning the dating of the copies at the BnF, basing my analyses in large part on watermarks. As C. M. Briquet, author of the monumental Filigranes: dictionnaire historique des marques du papier dès leur apparition vers 1282 jusqu’en 1600, readily acknowledged, watermarks are an inexact science.\(^2\) Nonetheless, used judiciously they can provide valuable information, particularly when corroborated by other evidence. Most of the manuscripts considered in this essay have recognizable watermarks and their identification can help resolve lingering questions about the dating of the different copies of the Seritude volontaire. They also turn out to be intriguing for an additional reason: the Folger copy and two out of the four Paris copies are on paper made by papermakers operating in and around Troyes, with a particular concentration in the town of Châlons-sur-Marne.\(^3\) Whether this is significant remains to be determined. After putting forth my findings concerning papermakers and the dating question, I briefly present and discuss some of the variants found in the Folger manuscript, comparing its text with that of the early manuscripts held at the BnF as well as a manuscript of the Seritude volontaire held at the Biblioteca Ambrosiana di Milano. Once belonging to Gian Vincezo Pinelli, this relatively unknown copy has recently been described by J.-E. Girot in an article that also briefly discusses a manuscript of the BnF as well as a manuscript of the Seritude volontaire found at the Archives de Chambéry during the livre de raison of Jean de Piochet.\(^4\) I conclude the essay with some thoughts about productive areas for further research, some of which I hope to pursue, and all of which would benefit from the expertise and the legwork of other scholars.

\(^4\) See J.-E. Girot, “Une version inconnue du Discours de la Seritude volontaire de La Boétie,” Bibliothèque d’Humanisme et Renaissance, n° 3, 2001, pp. 551-565. The shelf mark for the codex containing the copy of the Seritude volontaire at the Biblioteca Ambrosiana di Milano is A 70 Inf. For the manuscript at the Archives de Chambéry, it is Série 1 J 279 (1). To my knowledge, the Piochet manuscript, which I have not yet had the opportunity to see, was first signaled by Jean Paul Barbier, Ma Bibliothèque poétique, Deuxième partie, Ronsard (Geneva: Droz. 1990). p. 326.
Folger Vb. 49

Henry Folger acquired the codex currently bearing the shelf mark Vb. 49 in early 1925 from the W. T. Smedley collection. The item appears as No. 42 in the Smedley catalogue. Smedley had purchased it at a Sotheby’s auction of manuscripts once belonging to the great collector Sir Thomas Phillipps. In the Sotheby’s sales catalogue, the manuscript is listed under the heading “MARY Q. OF SCOTS. RECUEIL DE PIECES HISTORIQUES DU SEIZIÈME SIÈCLE.” This appellation may explain Smedley’s interest in the manuscript—he was a collector of documents relating to Queen Elizabeth—as well as the fact that the copy of the Servitude volontaire in it has escaped noticed by scholars of the French Renaissance. Indeed, among the documents found in the manuscript that are listed by name in the catalogue, only one is singled out for particular attention: “DISCOURS TOUCHANT LA ROYNE D’ANGLERRE CONTRE LA ROYNE D’ESCOSEL (Mary Q. of Scots), trouvé entre les papiers de feu Cavagna.” This “discours” was subsequently extracted from the manuscript and is currently at the Morgan Library in New York with the shelf mark MA 897. The catalogue description of the manuscript also claims, without explaining why, that it probably belonged to Jacques-Auguste de Thou.5

A note in pencil on the inside of the front cover of the manuscript indicates that it was once #4609 in Phillipps’ manuscript collection. In the Phillipps catalogue, it is entitled “Mélanges Historiques, &c.” The brief description of the manuscript there mentions only that it includes a “Discours sur la Majesté & Dignité du Roy” as well as a “Dc sur la Royn d’Angleterre, & la Reyne d’Escosse, &c. &c.” Phillipps purchased the manuscript from John Thomas Payne, an eminent bookseller, ca. 1830.6 In addition to rehearsing much of this information, Seymour de Ricci includes two additional details in his census of medieval and Renaissance manuscripts in the United States and in Canada. First, the manuscript apparently belonged to someone by the name of Connay ca. 1600. (The name Connay or Connays appears at the top of fol. 1r of the manuscript; see Figure 1.) Second, the portion of the manuscript currently at the Morgan Library was removed by someone by the name of Pearson. Curiously, in his otherwise exhaustive list of the manuscript’s contents, de Ricci omits any reference to La Boétie’s treatise.7

Vb. 49 is foliated 1-198 in the same hand, although folios 102-114, 168-183, and 186-189 are wanting. The whereabouts of folios 102-114 are known-they are now in the Morgan Library. The location of the other missing folios is not known. The documents copied into the codex are in two different professional scribal hands. The first hand is found through folio 143 while the second is found from folio 144 to the end of the manuscript. Many folios are blank. This fact, along with the binding and the high quality of the paper, demonstrate that it was a fairly deluxe manuscript.

All of the paper in the manuscript has the same watermark. It is comprised of a capital letter “B” within a shield surmounted by a crown and a quatrefeuilles on a stem, with the name NICOLASLEBE in a banner below. A member of a prominent paper making family—we will see the Le Be name again—, Nicolas Le Bé was active in Châlons from around 1553 to 1605. The presence of the papermaker’s name in the banner with a distinctive error—the “A” in Nicolas is upside down—makes precise identification of the watermark possible. It corresponds exactly with Briquet #8081. According to Briquet, paper bearing this watermark appears in the early 1580s. Given this information and the fact that none of the documents in the manuscript bears a date later than 1585, it seems reasonable to assume that the manuscript was composed in the late 1580s or early 1590s. In any case, it was made after the first printed editions of the Servitude volontaire were published in 1577, which is the single most important issue when it comes to the dating of the manuscripts.

The manuscript opens with a “Table sommaire des matieres et temes en ce present livre ou registre” (1r; see Figure 1). In the second hand is added “Jusques au feuille 144.” On folio 144r is a “Table du contenu en ce presente repertoire Cy aprés transcript” listing the contents in the second part of the manuscript. The entry for the Servitude volontaire in the “Table sommaire” reads “Discours ample pour montrer que la dommacion de plusieurs ne peult estre bonne fol. xliiiij” (1r). This somewhat misleading designation—the Servitude volontaire was not “rebaptised” (to use Montaigne’s expression) Le contr’un for no reason—is expanded on the first page of the treatise.8 Its title there is “Discours pour montrer que la dommacion de plusieurs ne peult estre bonne Actendu que la puissance d’un seul se trouve bien souvent Insupportable Mesmes quand Il advient quil prent ce titre de Maistre dont on peut voir quil a este mal conclud et Infere en ce distic francois” (44r; see Figure 2). Of the extant titles for the treatise, this is by far the most elaborate. The “distic francois” in question presumably consists of the two verses from the Iliad that open the Servitude volontaire. Nowhere in the manuscript is the author of the treatise mentioned.

8 Early in “De l’amitié,” Montaigne writes that “C’est vn discours auquel il donna nom De la Servitude volontaire [sic], mais ceux qui l’ont ignore, l’ont bien proprement depuis rebaptisé, le contre vn.,” Michel de Montaigne, Essais de Messire Michel Seigneur de Montaigne (Bordeaux: S Millanges. 1580). f. 252.
The BNF Manuscripts and the Dating Debate

As is well known, the first complete print edition of the Servitude volontaire appeared anonymously in 1577, almost fifteen years after La Boétie's death in 1563, in the third volume of a collection of historical documents and Protestant writings entitled Memoires de l'estat de France, sous Charles Neufsimes. Three years earlier, in 1574, reworked fragments of the Servitude volontaire had appeared in an earlier Protestant work, this one responding to the 1572 St. Bartholomew Day Massacres. In 1579, the Parliament of Bordeaux had copies of the Memoires burned. Thereafter, La Boétie's treatise seems to have circulated covertly as a manuscript (Cardinal Richelieu is said to have sought it) until 1727, when it would appear in print again as an appendix to a Pierre Coste edition of Montaigne's Essais.

Because of this belated and complicated print history, the dating of the manuscript tradition is of great interest. Do the manuscripts predate or postdate the print tradition? Which manuscript is the earliest one? Does the earliest copy also offer the best text? The debate over these questions has focused on three early manuscripts of the Servitude volontaire housed at the Bibliothèque nationale de France. They are the de Mesmes manuscript (Fonds français 839), the Dupuy manuscript (Fonds Dupuy 239, bound with another document with the cote Dupuy 238), and an unnamed manuscript (Fonds français 20157). There is consensus that a fourth manuscript of the Servitude volontaire, also housed at the BnF (Fonds français 17298), is a later copy. I will nonetheless suggest below that it is of more than passing interest.

Nadia Gontarbert has undertaken the most extensive study of the manuscript tradition. She dates the three early manuscripts of the Servitude volontaire at the Bibliothèque nationale to the sixteenth century and contends that they all predate the print tradition. Based on a formidable philological analysis, she asserts that the de Mesmes manuscript is the oldest. In her 12 On Richelieu, see Tallemant des Réaux, Les Historiettes, ed. Georges Mongrédien, 8 vols., t. 2 (Paris: Garnier Frères, n.d.), p. 48. According to Magnien, the first printed edition of the Servitude volontaire after the sixteenth century was Etienne de La Boétie, "Discours d'Estienne de La Boétie, de la Servitude volontaire Ou le Contr'un," in Essais de Michel Seigneur de Montaigne, ed. P. Coste (La Haye: P. Gusse & J. Néaulme, 1727), pp. 74-136. See Magnien #17. I have examined another 1727 Coste edition of the Essais (Geneva: M. M. Bousquet & Comp.), which also contains the Servitude volontaire on pages 74-136 of the fifth volume. According to Gabriel Richou, ed., Inventaire de la Collection des ouvrages et documents réunis par J.-F. Payen et J.-B. Bastide sur Michel de Montaigne (Paris: Librairie de Léon Téchener, 1878), a single pre-publication copy remains of a 1724 censored edition of the Essais that was to contain the text of the Servitude volontaire (14). This information is repeated in the Catalogue général des livres imprimés de la Bibliothèque nationale, vol. 117 (Paris: Imprimerie nationale, 1932), entry #176 under the article "Montaigne." I have examined the copy in question and determined that the bibliographical information recorded in the catalogues is incorrect. In fact, these volumes comprise an imperfect example of Coste's 1745 edition, 7 vols. (Paris: Martinet). The misidentification occurred because the title page is missing and, in a footnote dated "20 octobre 1724" on page 2 of volume VII, the censor Blanchard records his approval of the text of Montaigne's letters and Coste's notes to the Essais. (A manuscript note on the flyleaf of volume I of the misidentified copy points to this footnote in justifying the 1724 as the publication date of the text.) This approval however is not evidence of the text's publication in 1724, but rather indicates that it was in 1724 that Blanchard approved the letters and notes for publication. The note in question, which appears in numerous and perhaps all Coste editions of the Essais, is found on page 2 of volume VII of the 1745 edition.

13 For a succinct description of these manuscripts, see, in addition to the editions of the Servitude volontaire cited here, Desplat, La Boétie: Le magistre aux nombreux mystères, p. 84; Magnien, Etienne de La Boétie, pp. 19-20; and Giroux, "Une version inconnue," p. 552, n. 5.
opinion, it is also the best text, by which she means the closest to a presumed original, and should therefore continue to be used as the basis for modern editions. She suggests that the other extant manuscripts descend from the de Mesmes copy. Moreover, according to Gontarbert, François 20157 was possibly the copy used to prepare the text of the Servitude volontaire found in the Memoires. She also argues that two related texts appended to the de Mesmes copy of the Servitude volontaire but in a different hand from it, one entitled “Extrait du livre de La boîte pour y répondre” and the other entitled “Contre La Boëtie,” were written more or less contemporaneously with the production of the copy of the Servitude volontaire they are bound with. For this reason, she suggests that “Contre La Boëtie” offers insight into the early reception of the Servitude volontaire before its publication as Protestant propaganda in the 1570s colored the text’s meaning.

Français 839 (the ‘de Mesmes’ manuscript)

Gontarbert’s hypothesis about the date of composition of the “Extrait” and “Contre La Boëtie” does not survive careful scrutiny. I adduce two kinds of evidence to support this contention. The first concerns the paper on which these documents are written and the second concerns a reference in “Contre La Boëtie” to a published work. The “Extrait” and “Contre La Boëtie” are written on paper bearing a distinctive watermark that probably dates from the 1580s. Based on the coat of arms of the Université de Paris, the watermark consists of three Fleurs de Lys in a chevron formation within a shield, surmounted by a book suspended from clouds. Above the shield is a quatrefoils on a stem while below it there is a banner containing the name SOIVELLE. This watermark, used by Siméon Nivelle le Jeune, corresponds with Briquet #1843, as Michel Magnien has already noted. 16

15 A transcription of the text of the “Extrat du texte de La Boëtie pour y répondre”—or at least of the readily legible parts—may be found in Gontarbert’s edition of De la Servitude volontaire ou Contre’un, pp. 196-211.

"Contre La Boëtie" also contains a reference to the Stephanus edition and translation of Callimachus' hymns and epigrams, Callimachi Cyrenaici hymni (cum suis scholiis graecis) & epigrammata, published in Geneva in 1577. At the top of fol. 16r of the manuscript, we find the following sentence, which quotes in Latin translation from the "Hymn to Jupiter" by Callimachus: "Le poete Callimachus dict ainsy a Jupiter Ab joue sunt Reges post jouem nihil est divinius usque Regibus." This translation resembles that of Stephanus, which is included in an appendix to Callimachi Cyrenaici hymni: "Ab Ioue sunt reges. nihil est diuinius vsquam/Regibus" (111). Moreover, in the margins of fol. 16r of "Contre La Boëtie," we find a page number ("pa. 5") and possible variants for a word in the original Greek—is it λεξιν ταξιν or λεξιν? The handwritten Latin text continues for more than half the page, and then the author remarks, "Cecy se dira en partant de Stephanus." On page 5 of the 1577 Callimachus edition, the reader will find both the Greek verse quoted in Latin translation in the de Mesmes manuscript ("E'ex &i Διος θουλης. ἐπι Διος ουδιν άνάκτον/ Θεοτερον") and, in the marginal scholia of the Greek text of the hymn, a gloss to the next line in the poem that records the same variants listed in the de Mesmes manuscript.

Based on this evidence, I conclude that "Contre La Boëtie" could not have been written before 1577, date of the publication of the third volume of the Mémoires de l'estat de France in which the Servitude volontaire first appeared in print. Therefore, the two texts bound with the de Mesmes copy of the Servitude volontaire do not predate the publication by Protestants of La Boëtie's treatise.

The more significant debate concerns the dating of the de Mesmes copy of the Servitude volontaire itself and not the dating of the texts bound with it. Jean-Louis Bourgeon has vigorously and influentially contested Gontarbert's assessment of the manuscript. He argues that such details as handwriting and paper size clearly date the copy of the Servitude volontaire in the de Mesmes manuscript to the seventeenth century. Bourgeon concludes that modern editions of the Servitude volontaire should be based on the 1577 edition of the Mémoires de l'estat de France or on François 20157. Françoise Bayard affirms this position in her "Présentation" to the Imprimerie nationale edition of the 17 This manuscript deserves a more detailed study of marginal comments and probable sources, as Gontarbert herself remarks.

Servitude volontaire, which is indeed based on François 2015 and the Memoires. Nonetheless, while Gontarbert is mistaken about the dating of the “Extrait,” my findings strongly suggest that the copy of the Servitude volontaire bound with it does date to the sixteenth century, as she contended. My findings also support the possibility that this manuscript is the oldest of the known copies, although they do not prove it. (I do not seek here to resolve the even thornier question of which manuscript offers the best text, although I will suggest in concluding that too much concern for the identification of the best text may distract us from potentially more fruitful avenues of inquiry.)

Bourgeon contends that the manuscript is not written in a sixteenth century hand. Fortunately, since the debates of the paleographers may be infinite, I can adduce other evidence to support my skepticism about his objection. Yet again, the manuscript in question is on paper bearing a readily identifiable watermark. It consists of the device of Charles IX: two interlaced columns surmounted by a crown. To the device is added a quatrefoiilling on a stem above and the name ÉDMON DENISE in a banner below. This watermark is Briquet #4432 and it is found on paper dating from as early as 1556, with a lacuna until 1563. (1563 is a particularly evocative date, given that it is also the year of La Boétie’s death.) Briquet observes that since Charles IX did not become king until 1560, the 1556 date might not be accurate, although it does appear on two separate documents he examined. He surmises that they could be later copies of a document from 1556. In any case, the paper is well-attested in the 1560s and 1570s and, on April 7 1564, Denise received “lettres patentes” permitting him to use the device in the watermarks for his paper. As for the question of size, Briquet notes that with this very paper, Edmond Denise introduced a larger format that would gradually spread through France. We can thus be confident that the de Mesmes manuscript indeed offers an early witness of the text of the Servitude volontaire and not a late seventeenth-century copy, as Bourgeon and those influenced by him have contended.

It is worth noting that the three papermaking families identified thus far were intimately linked. The Denise and Le Bé families intermarried in the late fifteenth century. Both traced their nobility back to the same ancestor, Simonne Le Compasseur. They also married into and worked closely with 20 Magnien identifies the watermark as Briquet #4433, which is quite similar to #4432. He suggests that the paper was made during the reign of Henri II. For reasons about to be discussed in the body of this essay, there are reasons to doubt such an early date of fabrication.

22 Briquet, Filigranes, t. IV, pp. 269-270, and Gaudriault, Filigranes et autres caractéristiques, p. 87.
23 Le Clert explains that “Appartenant à la noblesse champenoise dite noblesse du ventre, les Denise avaient adopté les armoires d’une de leurs aïeules, Jacquette de Bray, the Nivelle family in the sixteenth century. Because of their shared ancestors the Compasseurs, the arms of the Denise, Le Bé, and Nivelle families all included three compasses in pyramid formation. Watermarks associated with these families appear on the paper used to make Vb. 49, the de Mesmes manuscript, and François 20157. They also appear on documents bound with the Dupuy manuscript and with François 17298.

Dupuy 239

Dupuy 239, which consists of the Serviude volontaire, is bound with another manuscript, Dupuy 238, entitled “Voiages, & Relations” (fol. 4r). The Dupuy copy of the Serviude volontaire is written on paper bearing two different watermarks, both of which are pitchers (referred to by Briquet as “pots”). One of the two is readily identifiable. It consists of a pitcher surmounted by a fleur de lys with a handle on one side and an upside down heart in the middle. This is Briquet #12561 and it is attested around the years 1572-1574 in Orléans. The papermaker has not been identified. The other watermark might be Briquet #12553, although this identification is tentative. Briquet #12553 is attested in documents from the 1560s.

On the first page of the codex, there is a note dated 13 February 1894 indicating that the “Volume” is “composé de 2 parties.” Although this does not necessarily mean that the two manuscripts were joined during Dupuy’s lifetime, certain details concerning Dupuy 238 seem worth mentioning here. The “Table du contenu de ce Livre” (5r) is on paper bearing a watermark with the name IAQVELEBE in a banner underneath the letter “B,” which is itself surmounted by a flower with five petals on a stem emerging from a crown. Briquet remarks that similar watermarks with this name are found from the 1590s “jusqu’en 1626 et peut-être au-dela” (note to #8083). Gaudriault demonstrates that there were examples into the 1630s (see the discussion of François 17298 below). Paper “signed” Jacques Le Bé also appears in both François 17298 and 20157, and elsewhere in Dupuy 238. The first travel account in “Voiages, & Relations” is entitled “Voiage de Monsieur d’Aramont ambassadeur pour le Roy a Constantinople es années 1547, 1548, 1549” (7r). It is written on paper with the name IAQVELEBE in a banner under the letter “B,” in this case within a shield surmounted by a crown. This might be Le Clert #200, which is found around 1596-1606.

One final document bound in Dupuy 238 also merits mention here. Entitled “Voiage qui a esté fait de Paris iusques a la Chine par terre par le Sieur de Feine,” it is written on paper bearing a watermark composed of the name EDMONDENISE inside a banner surmounted by a crown of laurels over two other crowns. This watermark is probably Gaudriault #413, which dates to the late sixteenth and early seventeenth centuries. Intriguingly, it or a very similar watermark is also found in a document bound with the copy of the Servitude volontaire in Français 20157. This paper was probably made by the son of the Edmond Denise who was the fabrificant of the paper on which the de Mesmes copy of the Servitude volontaire is written. He is known to have collaborated extensively with Jacques Le Bé.

Français 20157

Français 20157, another miscellany comprised of various documents bound together in a codex, comes from the collections of the Sainte-Marthe brothers. Containing a fascinating array of materials, it, like the Folger manuscript, merits a dedicated study of its own. Most of the materials in Français 20157 seem to have been gathered or written with an eye towards eventual publication in one format or another. Others consist of financial analyses of possible publishing endeavors or projects to curry favor at the court. Documents in the manuscript include travel journals, regional histories, genealogies, lists of members of the French court to whom free copies of books had been distributed, a note about a possible Arabic edition of the Koran as well other publishing endeavors in "oriental" languages, and a census of parish churches in France. Documents dated as late as the 1670s are bound in the codex.

The copy of the Servitude volontaire found in Français 20157 is written on paper bearing a watermark comprised of two capital letter “B”s back-to-back wearing a crown surmounted by a quatrefeuilles. Another example of paper made by the Le Bé family, this is Briquet #9273 and/or perhaps Gaudriault #744 (see also Le Clert #197). According to Briquet, the earliest attestation of the watermark is 1586; Gaudriault says it was used quite frequently in documents dated 1601 and 1602 but is also found in documents dated as late as 1618.

Based on the watermark, I propose that Français 20157 was not used to prepare the text of the Servitude volontaire appearing in the Memoires, as Gontarbert, Bourgeon, and Bayard have hypothesized. Instead, it is probable that Français 20157 was copied from the Memoires or from a manuscript tradition closely linked to it.

In addition to the Servitude volontaire, three other documents in Français 20157 merit particular attention here. All are religious texts and they immediately precede and follow the Servitude volontaire. The first, which does not have a title, is on paper bearing a watermark comprised of the name EDMONDENISE in a banner under three crowns—a watermark very similar if not identical to the paper in the Dupuy manuscript on which the “Voyage qui a esté fait de Paris jusques a la Chine par terre par le Sieur de Feine” is written. The second, entitled Meditation Christienne, sur le point de la dissolution de L’Ame d’avec le corps, is on paper bearing a watermark comprised of the capital letter “B” with a quatrefoils on a stem emerging out of a diamond with two leaves above and a banner reading IAQUELEBE below. This is also similar to paper found in Dupuy 238 and François 17298. The Meditation comes immediately before the Servitude volontaire. A third religious tract, on the subject of true happiness, follows La Boëtie’s treatise.

I point to these documents for several reasons. As if its potentially inflammatory nature required containment and despite its paucity of Christian references, the copy of the Servitude volontaire in François 20157 is surrounded by religious tracts about the afterlife that advocate submission to God. (In François 17298, the Servitude volontaire is more ambiguously followed by texts concerning the “Divers moiens dont se sont servis nos Rois pour faire des emprunts” (fol. 142r).) Perhaps more intriguing is the fact that the two documents preceding the Servitude volontaire are on paper made by the Denise and Le Be families. Might these documents have once been bound separately from the rest of the codex, or at the very least come from the same source?

François 17298

The copy of the Servitude volontaire bound in François 17298 is comprised of paper bearing two different watermarks. Both are variations of the coat of arms of France and Navarre. One has the name TDAURELLE in a banner below the shield. According to Gaudriault, Thomas Daurelle was based in Ambert and active from 1633 to 1646 (195). The second watermark has a small cartouche under the shield bearing the initials AB or AR. Delauney reproduces a watermark very similar but not identical to this one with the initials AB in the cartouche (#168). The initials stand for Antoine Boy of Chamalières and the paper bearing his initials dates to around 1640.

François 17298 also includes paper made by Jacques Le Bé. A blank folio immediately following the Servitude volontaire bears a watermark with IAQUELEBE under the letter “B” which is itself surmounted by a flower with five petals on a stem. A similar watermark is found on a document near the end of the codex. After the title page, there is also a table of contents entitled “TABLE Des Pieces contenues dans ce Volume,” which has a watermark comprised of the capital letter “B” surmounted by a quatrefoils and with two banners below. The first banner contains the name IAQUELEBE and the second a year, which may be 1633. This is probably Gaudriault #743.

Gaudriault notes that “L’inscription de la date reste longtemps exceptionnelle. On Finally, many of the folios in the codex have a watermark consisting of a device with three compasses in pyramid formation within interlaced columns surmounted by a crown. In a banner below is the name NICOLAS DENISE. Based on the Denise family arms, this watermark is Gaudriault #79, which dates to 1636-37.30

Variants

I present and discuss below a few of the more intriguing variants found in the Folger manuscript. Often, the text in Vb. 49 is identical to that found in the de Mesmes manuscript where there are variants in the other early copies. This is not, however, always the case—sometimes the Folger manuscript offers the same reading as other manuscripts where they differ from the de Mesmes copy. Particularly suggestive are variants shared by the Folger and Ambrosian manuscripts, although there are also points where the Ambrosian manuscript has the same text as the de Mesmes copy when there is a variant in Vb. 49. Some variants are unique to the Folger manuscript. In general, where the Folger manuscript differs from the de Mesmes manuscript, the language in the Folger manuscript is simpler. At moments, the syntax is less complicated. What might be considered superfluous words or redundant phrases are frequently absent. On rare occasions the text is more expansive, as if augmented to clarify an idea. There are also occasional differences in vocabulary.

I compiled the following list of variants by comparing the text of the Folger manuscript with the text of the Servitude volontaire found in Nadine Gontarbert's edition and with the Ambrosian manuscript. Gontarbert follows the de Mesmes manuscript which, for better or for worse, and despite some debate, is still the privileged witness of the text.31 She has also conducted the most extensive collation of the early manuscripts and print editions to date, listing variants from the 1577 and 1578 editions of the Memoires and from Dupuy 239, Francais 17298, and Francais 20157. Citations below from the de Mesmes manuscript and from these other versions of the text are drawn from 30 Briquet explains that "Trois membres de la famille Denise ont employé ces armes : Claude, de 1575-88 environ; Edmond, de 1584-89; enfin Nicolas, en 1631 et peut-être plus tard" (Filigranes, t. I, p. 96).

31 On some of the more peculiar readings found in the de Mesmes manuscript, see André Tournon, "Sur quelques aspérités du Discours de la Servitude volontaire," Montaigne Studies, vol. XI, 1999, pp. 61-76. The edition de référence for the Servitude volontaire remains that edited by Malcolm Smith from the de Mesmes manuscript but this edition does not include the variants found in the other manuscripts. A version of this edition, updated by Michel Magnien, was issued in 2001: Étienne de La Boétie, De la Servitude volontaire ou Contr`un, ed. Malcolm Smith with additional notes by Michel Magnien, Textes litteraires françois (Geneva: Droz, 2001). See the compte rendu of this edition by Jean Balsamo, Bibliothèque d’Humanisme et Renaissance, vol. LXIV, n° 3, 2002, pp. 787-789, which also offers an excellent synopsis of the state of La Boétie studies in 2002.
Gontarbert’s edition. Text from the Folger and Ambrosian copies are my own transcriptions of the manuscripts.

I begin with a simple variant shared by several manuscripts.

De Mesmes: voir un million d'hommes... (fol. 1; 79)

Folger: voir ung million de millions d'hommes... (fol. 44v)

According to Gontarbert’s edition, this variant is found in both Français 20157 and 17298, and in both the 1577 and the 1578 editions of the Memoires. It is also found in the Ambrosian manuscript. As the following example shows, however, the Folger manuscript does not always share variants with Français 20157 and the editions of the Memoires.

De Mesmes: voila certe une parole vraiment appartenante à Caton [...] la chose mesme parlera et jugera l'on a belle aventure qu'il estoit Romain, et n'e dedans Romee, et lors qu'elle estoit libre. (fol. 13; 101)

Folger: voyant certes une parole vrayement appartenante à Caton.... La chose parlera et Jugera lon a belle adventure qu'il estoit Romain, et n'e dans la vraye Rome et lors qu'elle estoit libre. (fol. 51v)

Français 20157 and the two editions of the Memoires have “Voyla vrayement une parole appartenante de Caton....” The Ambrosian manuscript has a similar reading: “Voyla vrayement une parole appartenant a Caton” (63r). Only the Folger manuscript has the variant “voyant” as the first word of the passage. The particular phrasing of the evocation of Rome, which varies widely across the different copies, is also unique to the Folger manuscript.

Others variants, such as the following, are more complicated and less felicitous.

De Mesmes: vous semês vos fruicts, afin qu'il en face le degast; vous meublès et remplissès vos maisons, afin de fournir a ses pilleries... (fol. 6; 87-88)

Folger: vous cueilles vos fruicts afin qu'il en face le degast, vos meubles afern de fournir a ses volleries... (fol. 47r)

Although the point is the same in the two versions, “semês” is more compelling than “cuilles,” suggesting as it does not just the harvesting of fruit that will be taken by a tyrant but also the loss of the longer-term investment involved in planting and cultivating. The absence of “remplissès” would not profoundly change the sense of the passage, but for the fact that in the Folger manuscript “meubles” has also gone from being a verb to a noun and the personal pronoun “vous” has become the possessive adjective “vos!” This fairly complicated and rather strange variant is unattested in the other manuscripts. Variants such as this one demonstrate that some care went into the process of revising the text of the Serritude volontaire. More care was used... than would be necessary merely to delete the occasional redundant phrase without damaging the syntax of the text. The variant even maintains a parallel structure of sorts. But that “meubles” has become the direct object of “cuilles” in a comprehensible but peculiar locution suggests that the revision process, while careful, was not meticulous. It is also worth noting that the Folger manuscript joins with Français 20157 and the 1577 and 1578 editions of the Mémoires in offering “volleryes” where the de Mesmes manuscript has “pilleries,” as does the Ambrosian manuscript (fol. 59v).

In the following example, the Folger manuscript has a unique variant in a passage that varies greatly across the extant early copies. It also shares one minor variant with the Dupuy manuscript not otherwise attested.

De Mesmes:
a Athenes ni à Sparte n'envoya il point, pour ce que ceux que Daire son pere y avoit envoyé, les Atheniens et les Spartains en avoient jetté les uns dedans les fossés, les autres dans les puits... (fol. 11-12; 99)

Folger:
a Athenes ny a Espanthe n'envoya il point pour ce que ceux que Daire son pere y avoit envoyez les Atheniens et les Lacedemoniens en avoyent jecté les uns dedans les fossez les autres dedans les puyts... (fol. 50v)

Ambrosiana:
A Spaties ny a Athenes n'envoya il point pour ce que ceux que Daire son pere y avoit envoyez pour faire pareille demande, les Spartains, et les Atheniens en avoit getté les uns dans des fossez, les autres dans des puits... (fol. 62v)

The Folger manuscript is the only one to have “Lacedemonians” for “Spartains.” The prepositions in the latter part of the passage vary across the early copies of the text. Only the Folger and the Dupuy manuscripts have “dedans les fossez... dedans les puyts.” While using “Lacedemonians” in the place of “Spartains” is clearly a significant variant, I doubt that the difference between “dedans” and “dans” is helpful in establishing manuscript filiation. I also reproduce the text of this passage in the Ambrosian manuscript because it offers an interesting and otherwise unattested variant that expands the text.

In the next two passages, what could be considered redundant text appearing in the other manuscripts, including the Ambrosian copy, is absent from the Folger manuscript. The first example, a well-known and rhetorically heated moment in the Servitude volontaire, differs widely across the various manuscripts.

De Mesmes:
Mais o bon dieu, que peut estre cela? comment dirons nous que cela s'appelle? quel malheur est celui la? quel vice ou plustot quel malheureux vice... (fol. 2; 80)

Folger:
Mais o bon dieu que peut estre cela? que pouvons dire que cela s'appelle, quelle vice ou plustost quelle malheureuse vice... (fol. 45r)

Ambrosiana:
Mais o bon DIEV: que peut estre cela? comment dirons nous que
The Ambrosian copy has the same text as the de Mesmes manuscript, with the exception of the intriguing reading of “vent” for “vice,” as Girot has discussed at some length. The second passage is a less celebrated moment but perhaps a more substantial variant:

De Mesmes: ils s’apprivoisent de lui obéir, et s’en fier tant que de lui donner quelques avantages... (fol. 2; 80)

Folger: ils s’apprivoisent de lui obeyr et lui donner quelz ques avantages... (fol. 45r)

This is another passage in which there is a variant in the Folger manuscript while the Ambrosian and de Mesmes manuscripts have the same text. Although the matter is debatable, it seems to me that these two raccourcissments in the Folger copy do not substantially alter the sense of the passage. The same cannot be said about the next example.

In this passage, one phrase is cut from the text and another revised, perhaps to clarify the original. The result, however, is that the meaning of the text has been subtly but significantly changed.

De Mesmes: entre les gens libres c’est a l’envy a qui miculx mieux, chacun pour le bien commun, chacun pour soi; ils s’attendent d’avoir tous leur part... (fol. 15; 106)

Folger: Entre les gens de bien et libres c’est a l’envy a qui miculx mieux et qui plus soignieusement cherche pour soi, la ou ils s’attendent d’avoir tous leur part... (fol. 53r)

Recognizing that a group’s destiny affects that of its constituent members, in this passage La Boétie—if we can take the de Mesmes manuscript to represent La Boétie’s text and ideas—strives a balance between self-interest and the common good. The Folger manuscript, on the other hand, drops “le bien commun” and augments attention to the individual’s efforts on his own behalf: “qui plus soignieusement cherche pour soi.” This revision, while perhaps common-sensical, actually contradicts the overall sense of the Servitude volontaire. The treatise contends that the desire to help those who are less fortunate and the desire to defend one’s own interests are both natural, although they can be adulterated by voluntary servitude. According to the Servitude volontaire, tyranny functions by cultivating a pyramid scheme of self-interest that is ultimately short-sighted. Whether this variant is an anomaly or can be said to function in tandem with other alterations to transform the Servitude volontaire’s overall meaning is a question that merits its own sustained analysis. The Ambrosian manuscript is almost identical to the de Mesmes manuscript, the only difference being that “tous” is in a different place in the phrase (fol. 64v-65r).

The next two variants are quite substantial and not entirely unique to the Folger manuscript. In the following passage, a large amount of text present in the other manuscripts with the exception of the Ambrosian manuscript is absent from the Folger manuscript.

De Mesmes: entre autres choses il dit cela que les mauvais Roys se servent d'estrangers à la guerre, et les soldats ne s'osans fier de mettre a leurs gens, a qui ils ont fait tort, les armes en main. il y a bien eu de bons rois qui on eu a leur soude des nations estrangeres, comme des francais mesmes, et plus ancres d'autrefois qu'aujourd'duy; mais a une autre intention pour garder les leurs, n'estimant rien le dommage de l'argent pour esparmer les hommes, c'est ce que disoit Scipion ce crois je le grand Afriquain qu'il aimeroit mieux avoir sauvé un citoyen que defait cent ennemis. mais certes cela... (fol. 16; 107)

Folger: entre autres choses il dict cela que les mauvais Roys sont contraints se servir des estrangers a la guerre et les soldoyent ne s'osans fier de mettre a leurs gens a qui ils ont fait tort les armes en main. Mais certes cela... (fol. 53v)

Ambrosiana: Entre autres choses, il dit cela que les mauvais Roys se servent d'estrangers à la guerre, et les soldoyent, ne s'osans fier de mettre a leurs gens, auxquels ils ont faict tort les armes en la main. Certes ce la... (fol. 65r)

This variant is particularly revealing because the missing passage is also absent from the Ambrosian manuscript and present in the Chambéry manuscript but only in a marginal addition (Girot 564). The following example shows another striking similarity between the Ambrosian and Folger manuscripts.

De Mesmes: qu'il peut tout, et qu'il ni a droit, ni devoir aucun qui l'oblige, faisant son estat de conté sa volonté pour raison, et n'avoir compaignon aucun, mais d'estre de tous maistre. Donques n'est pas grand pitie... (fol. 25; 125)

Folger: qu'il peut tout, et qu'il ny a droit ny devoir aucun qui l'oblige, Mais qui est de tous le maistre. Donques n'est ce pas grand pitié... (fol. 60r)

Ambrosiana: qu'il peut tout. Donques n'est ce pas grand pitié... (fol. 70r)

The passage that is condensed in the Folger manuscript is entirely omitted in the Ambrosian copy. These variants, not found in the manuscripts at the BnF, certainly suggest some relationship between the Folger and the Ambrosian manuscripts, although as I have shown, there are other moments where the two copies seem to come from different textual traditions.

One last major variant is worth mentioning. On fol. 56r, the Folger manuscript reproduces Du Bellay's translation of several verses from Book VI of Virgil's Aeneid (see figure 3). In both the de Mesmes manuscript and the Dupuy manuscript, what is presumably La Boetie's own translation is given in the text with Du Bellay's alongside it in the margins. The Folger manuscript is the only one to give du Bellay's translation in place of that of La Boetie.

Conclusion

The Servitude volontaire is famously perplexing. It has provoked questions about the date of its composition, the establishment of a definitive text, its intended meaning, even its authorship. The study of the manuscript tradition will continue to play an important role in addressing these concerns. In this essay, rather than focusing on interpretive issues, I have for the most part sought to make available information about these manuscripts that might suggest avenues for future research. What might it mean that many of the known manuscripts of the Servitude volontaire are written on paper made by three related families operating in and around Troyes, and that the copies of the treatise not written on such paper are bound with documents that are? Given the proximity of the papermakers to Paris and the caliber of their product, other lines of inquiry may prove more fruitful. How well can we track the sale and circulation of blank paper from the 1560s to the 1620s? Can we learn anything about—and from—the paper preferences of individuals and institutions in the same time period?

In his discussion of the manuscript tradition, Girot argues that the presence of a copy of the Servitude volontaire in the papers of Gian Vincezo Pinelli demonstrates that the Servitude volontaire circulated in ways more disparate than previously imagined. The documents bound with the Folger manuscript may give us further ideas about the circulation of the treatise. It is certainly intriguing that so many of the documents in the Folger manuscript are related to Protestantism. The fact that Vb. 49 is a copy of another miscellany—or perhaps a compilation of other documents not themselves bound together—leaves open the possibility that we might be able to identify some of the originals. Whether this information can help us better our understanding of the Servitude volontaire or its circulation remains to be seen. Moreover, the recent discovery of heretofore unknown manuscripts in places as disparate as Milan and Washington, DC reminds us that there may be yet more manuscripts to be discovered.

Girot also argues that the manuscript tradition is far more complicated than has usually been acknowledged and that the evidence he presents suggests that "il ne soit guère possible de faire l'économie d'une veritable edition critique de DSV" (565). In his compte rendu of an updated version of Malcolm Smith's edition of the Servitude volontaire, Jean Balsamo agrees with this finding. Rather than reinforcing the authority of the de Mesmes manuscript, writes Balsamo, Girot's study "vient au contraire remettre en question les habituelles certitudes, confirmer la coexistence de plusieurs traditions manuscrites, et compliquer un stemma qui semblait jusqu'alors linéaire" (789). My consideration of the Folger manuscript has led to similar conclusions. To my mind, however, this is far from being a cause for despair. Indeed, it may be a boon. A turn away from the pursuit of the earliest manuscript and the best text and towards the possible significance of documents bound with copies of the Servitude volontaire, the possible circulation of the codices and the documents they contain, and the ways in which variants may nuance the meaning of individual copies of the treatise holds out great promise for further research and discovery.\footnote{I would like to thank several individuals affiliated with the Folger Shakespeare Library for their generous assistance as I worked on Vb. 49. These include Laetitia Yeandle, Emerita Curator of Manuscripts, and Heather Wolfe, the current Curator of Manuscripts, as well Elizabeth Walsh, Head of Reader Services. I would also like to thank Professor Philippe Desan for several very helpful bibliographic suggestions and my colleague Martin Eisner for putting his keen editorial eye and rampant bibliophilic at my disposal.}
