Durham Research Online

Deposited in DRO:
26 May 2017

Version of attached file:
Published Version

Peer-review status of attached file:
Peer-reviewed

Citation for published item:

Further information on publisher’s website:
http://www.germanlawjournal.com/

Publisher’s copyright statement:

Additional information:

Use policy

The full-text may be used and/or reproduced, and given to third parties in any format or medium, without prior permission or charge, for personal research or study, educational, or not-for-profit purposes provided that:

- a full bibliographic reference is made to the original source
- a link is made to the metadata record in DRO
- the full-text is not changed in any way

The full-text must not be sold in any format or medium without the formal permission of the copyright holders.

Please consult the full DRO policy for further details.
Psychoanalyzing International Law(yers)

By Matthew Nicholson*

Abstract

This Article reads the work of Martti Koskenniemi—arguably the most significant international legal thinker of the post-Cold War era—as an exercise in (Lacanian) psychoanalysis. Excavating the links between Koskenniemi and French psychoanalyst Jacques Lacan, and analyzing the origins of those links in Koskenniemi’s debt to the Harvard branch of the American Critical Legal Studies (CLS) movement, it argues that over almost thirty years Koskenniemi has employed psychoanalytic techniques to rebuild the self-confidence of international law(yers). The success of this confidence-building project explains the acclaim Koskenniemi’s work enjoys. As international law’s psychoanalyst he has defined the identity of the international lawyer and mapped the structure of international legal argument, stabilizing international law’s present reality by synchronizing it with narratives of its past. Any attempt to destabilize that reality or depart from present structures into an alternative future must start from an analysis of Koskenniemi’s methods and it is in this sense, and not out of a more pure interest in Koskenniemi’s work, that this Article deconstructs Koskenniemi’s œuvre. It situates his method, reveals his choices, and explores their limits in an effort to develop (tentative) proposals for a “new” international law(yer) and an international legal future outside the structure that Koskenniemi has mapped so effectively and affectively.

* Assistant Professor in International Law, Durham University, Durham Law School, matthew.c.nicholson@durham.ac.uk. Thank you to Professor David Gurnham (Southampton), Dr. Aoife O’Donoghue (Durham), Professor Robert McCorquodale (British Institute of International and Comparative Law), and Professor Peter Goodrich (Cardozo Law) for reading and commenting so helpfully on earlier drafts. Some of the research reflected in this Article was undertaken during doctoral study at UCL. I am very grateful to Dr. Ralph Wilde and Professor Catherine Redgwell for their generosity and support as supervisors, and to UCL’s Graduate School for financial support of my doctoral work. All errors and inadequacies are my fault.
[A] genuine critique of structuralism commits us to working our way completely through it so as to emerge . . . into some wholly different and theoretically more satisfying philosophical perspective.¹

“le nom-du-père”/“le non du père”/“les non-dupes errant” . . . those who think that they are not duped err.²

“those who are not taken in err”³

A. Introduction

Martti Koskenniemi is perhaps the most significant international legal thinker of recent times. His first book, From Apology to Utopia,⁴ has been described as “the most significant late 20th century English language monograph in the field of international law,”⁵ his second, Gentle Civilizer,⁶ has been credited with “trigger[ing] a ‘historiographical turn’ in the discipline of international law,”⁷ and no textbook is complete without a section on Koskenniemi’s work.⁸ Widely regarded as having defined and explained the structure of international law and the identity of the international lawyer in the post-Cold War era, he has virtually unrivalled influence over international legal discourse. While From Apology is the standard reference on international legal theory, Koskenniemi’s work extends beyond theory and into international legal practice. This is reflected in his leadership of the final stages of the International Law Commission’s (ILC) important work on fragmentation, perhaps the most significant challenge to the coherence of international legal order in modern times.

⁸ See, e.g., Jan Klabbers, International Law 13 (2013); Malcolm Shaw, International Law 45–46 (7 ed. 2014); Martin Dixon, Robert McCurquodale & Sarah Williams, Cases and Materials on International Law 12, 16 (5d ed. 2011) (extracting from Koskenniemi, From Apology, supra note 4, and web post by Koskenniemi); Andrew Clapham, Brierly’s Law of Nations xii (2d ed. 2012) (“Although legal methods may . . . vary, understanding the deeper structures and the legal labels used to explain them is essential to seeing how international law works”).

9 See Deborah Z. Cass, Navigating the Newstream: Recent Critical Scholarship in International Law, 65 NORDIC J. INT’L L. 341, 342 (1996) (observing “post Cold War confidence in international law has been replaced by a muted anxiety about its limitations”); Id. at 360, 383 (discussing Koskenniemi’s response to the “anxiety” identified at 342); David Kennedy, The Last Treatise, supra note 5, at 990 (“He has opened up the field’s professional practices for [political] contestation.”); Jason A. Beckett, Rebel Without a Cause? Martti Koskenniemi and the Critical Legal Project, 71(12) German L.J. 1045, 1045 (2006) (“Few books have attained the influence and impact of Martti Koskenniemi’s From Apology to Utopia.”).

10 Koskenniemi is, for example, a contributor to many of the most significant edited collections. See, e.g., Martti Koskenniemi, Projects of World Community, in REALIZING UTOPIA: THE FUTURE OF INTERNATIONAL LAW 3 (Antonio Cassese ed., 2012); Martti Koskenniemi, A History of International Law Histories, in THE OXFORD HANDBOOK OF THE HISTORY OF INTERNATIONAL LAW 943 (Bardo Fassbender & Anne Peters eds., 2012); Martti Koskenniemi, Transformations of Natural Law: Germany 1648–1815, in THE OXFORD HANDBOOK OF THE THEORY OF INTERNATIONAL LAW 59 (Anne Orford & Florian Hoffmann eds., 2016).

11 See Kennedy, The Last Treatise, supra note 5, at 982 (“Martti Koskenniemi’s From Apology to Utopia is the most significant late twentieth century English language monograph in the field of international law . . . it could well turn out to have been the last great original treatise in the international law field.”); Mario Prost, Born Again Lawyer: FATU as An Antidote to the “Positivist Blues”, 7 GERMAN L.J. 1037, 1037 (2006) (“[From Apology] might very well have been the single most influential book of the last 15 years in the field of international legal theory.”).

13 See Anne-Charlotte Martineau, The Rhetoric of Fragmentation: Fear and Faith in International Law, 22 LEIDEN J. INT’L L. 1 (2009); Gerhard Hafner, Risks Ensuing from Fragmentation of International Law, UN. Doc. A/55/10, annex, 143 (2000); Tomer Broude, Keep Calm and Carry On: Martti Koskenniemi and the Fragmentation of International Law, 27 TEMPLE INT’L & COMP. L.J. 279 (2016); Sean D. Murphy, Deconstructing Fragmentation: Koskenniemi’s 2006 ILC Project, 27 TEMPLE INT’L & COMP. L.J. 293 (2016). See also Akbar Rasulov, From Apology to Utopia and the Inner Life of International Law, 29 LEIDEN J. INT’L L. 641, 646 (2016) (commenting in terms that seem to capture the relationship between Koskenniemi’s fragmentation work and his work more generally, for all that Rasulov himself does not make this connection:

[The author of From Apology] recognized from the very outset . . . was that the key to winning any kind of intra-disciplinary theoretical struggles in modern international law lies in producing not just a new set of critical-theoretical ideas accessible primarily to professional legal academics, but a new system of intellectual tools and concepts accessible above all to the community of international
This Article reads Koskenniemi’s work as an exercise in Lacanian psychoanalysis; an application of Jacques Lacan’s psychoanalytic theory to international law and international lawyers. Casting Koskenniemi as Lacanian analyst and international law(yers) as analysand or patient, it treats Koskenniemi’s psychoanalysis as a process which “enable[s]” the patient to “get over itself,”\textsuperscript{15} a course of therapy which “enable[s]” the patient to recognize and live with(in) his neurosis by accepting that it cannot be “cure[d].”\textsuperscript{16}

The argument develops in three parts. The first, ‘Diagnosis,’ excavates the Lacanian foundations of Koskenniemi’s work; the second, ‘Therapy,’ links Koskenniemi’s work and Ernesto Laclau’s political theory; and the third, ‘Prognosis,’ considers the patient’s health and prospects after therapy.

Psychoanalysis has, I argue, given the patient a modern, elitist self-confidence, inuring it to the injustices of global postmodernity.\textsuperscript{17} The patient needs “new codes,”\textsuperscript{18} specifically, new legal practitioners: a system of tools and concepts which the practising lawyers could use to describe and express their day-to-day professional experiences and anxieties.)

\textsuperscript{15} Aristodemou, supra note 14, at 37.

\textsuperscript{16} Id.:

[The message from the (nasty) Lacanian analyst is not to cure the patient’s ego and return it to her well adjusted to reality—in other words, not to strengthen and perpetuate international law’s self-delusions but to lead it, kicking and screaming no doubt, to finding out the bloody histories that constituted it as a subject and enable it, in short, to ‘get over itself.’

See also, in the context of international criminal law, and with reference to Koskenniemi’s work, Frédéric Mégret, The Anxieties of International Criminal Justice, 29 LEIDEN J. INT’L L. 197 (2016).

\textsuperscript{17} See FRÉDÉRIC JAMESON, POSTMODERNISM OR, THE CULTURAL LOGIC OF LATE CAPITALISM 2 (1991) (“[T]he prophetic elitism and authoritarianism of the modern movement [in architecture] are remorselessly identified with the charismatic Master.”); David Kennedy, Apology to Utopia: The Structure of International Legal Argument, 31 HARVARD J. INT’L L.
historical-materialist codes, through which to re-imageine itself and engage with global postmodernity, because:

> [Our] social order is richer in information and more literate, and socially, at least, more ‘democratic’ in the sense of the universalization of wage labor ... [and] this new order no longer needs prophets and seers of the high modernist and charismatic type, whether among its cultural producers ... its politicians or, indeed, its international lawyers.

It is important to be clear about the nature and extent of the claims I am making about Koskenniemi’s work. In reading Koskenniemi’s work as a psychoanalysis of international lawyers I am not claiming that it is a psychoanalysis of international lawyers, nor that this is the only viable reading. I am claiming, however, that Koskenniemi’s work can and should be read as a Lacanian psychoanalysis, and that this reading provides the basis for re-thinking international law’s present and future.

---

19 JAMESON, POSTMODERNISM, supra note 17, at 394.

18 JAMESON, POSTMODERNISM, supra note 17, at 394.

19 See Carty, supra note 14, at 865 (advocating “a phenomenological posture vis-à-vis reality for which new languages need to be found”).

21 JAMESON, POSTMODERNISM, supra note 17, at 306.

22 See Balakrishnan Rajagopal, Martti Koskenniemi’s From Apology to Utopia: A Reflection, 7 GERMAN L.J. 1089, 1091 (2006):

> [W]hile I agree wholeheartedly [with Koskenniemi] that international law is what international lawyers make of it, I am not sure that there is a clear consensus that all practitioners need to be international lawyers, especially in the post-modern world of the early 21st century when international law-talk is occurring at the popular level.

23 See Caudill, supra note 14, at 654 (“My thesis is that psychoanalytic theory offers insights with which to confront some of the problematic aspects of CLS [critical legal studies]—insights that are already contains within the radical traditions on which CLS draws.”).
Recasting these claims in the language of Fredric Jameson’s The Political Unconscious, this Article presents Lacanian psychoanalysis as the “hidden master narrative” of Koskenniemi’s work, the “allegorical key” that unlocks and reveals the relationship between its “multiple meanings,” “unmask[ing]” his texts as “socially symbolic acts,” therapeutic exercises that have “enable[d]” international law to “get over itself.” It is in this sense, and while recognizing that my reading is not the only reading, that I argue for its “priority”: it projects a rival hermeneutic to those already enumerated...not so much by repudiating their findings as by arguing its ultimate philosophical and methodological priority over more specialized interpretive codes whose insights are strategically limited as much by their own situational origins as by

---

25 JAMESON, POLITICAL UNCONSCIOUS, supra note 24, at 13.

26 Id. See also id. at 14 (“Allegory is...the opening up of the text to multiple meanings, to successive rewritings and overwritings which are generated as so many levels and as so many supplementary interpretations.”); Paavo Kotiaho, A Return to Koskenniemi, or the Disconcerting Co-optation of Rupture, 7 GERMEN L.J. 484, 485 (2006) (noting a “contradiction between the appearance and essence of Koskenniemi’s work”).

27 JAMESON, POLITICAL UNCONSCIOUS, supra note 24, at 5 (“The assertion of a political unconscious proposes that we...explore the multiple paths that lead to the unmasking of cultural artifacts as socially symbolic acts.”).

28 Aristodemou, supra note 14, at 37.

29 For the most compelling readings of Koskenniemi’s work in the literature, over which I claim this psychoanalytic reading has “priority,” see generally Beckett, supra note 9 (critiquing what Beckett sees as inconsistencies in Koskenniemi’s work); Rasulov, supra note 13 (focusing on the importance of “Kelsenian legal positivism” and “Saussurean structuralist semiotics” in FROM APOLOGY, supra note 4; id. at 641); Justin Desautels-Stein, Chiastic Law in the Crystal Ball: Exploring Legal Formalism and its Alternative Futures, 2 LONDON R. INT’L L. 263 (2014) (reading Koskenniemi through the work of Soren Kierkegaard); Sahib Singh, Koskenniemi’s Images of the International Lawyer, 29 LEIDEN J. INT’L L. 699 (2016) (reading Koskenniemi through the work of Jean-Paul Sartre); Singh, The Critic(al Subject), supra note 14 (again reading Koskenniemi through the work of Jean-Paul Sartre); John Haskell, From Apology to Utopia’s Conditions of Possibility, 29 LEIDEN J. INT’L L. 667 (2016) (focusing on the historical aspects of FROM APOLOGY, supra note 4). Where relevant, in footnotes infra, I explain how my reading relates to the alternative readings offered by these authors.
the narrow or local ways in which they construe or construct their objects of study.\textsuperscript{30}

B. Diagnosis

I. Myth and Neurosis

The opening page of Koskenniemi’s \textit{From Apology to Utopia: The Structure of International Legal Argument}, published in 1989 and reissued in 2005, diagnoses international law’s neurosis:

Lawyers seem to have despaired over seeing their specific methodology and subject-matter vanish altogether if popular calls for sociological or political analyses are taken seriously. Ultimately, they believe, there is room for a specifically ‘legal’ discourse between the sociological and the political . . . and that this is the sphere in which lawyers must move if they wish to maintain their professional identity as something other than social or moral theorists.\textsuperscript{31}

Koskenniemi rejects the possibility of a “specifically ‘legal’ discourse” as a response to the threat from “sociological or political analyses.” “The structure of international legal argument” is defined by the “dynamics of [the] contradiction” between “normativity” and “concreteness”;\textsuperscript{32} there is no way out: \textsuperscript{33}

A law which would lack distance from State behaviour will or interest would amount to a non-normative \textsuperscript{30} \textsc{Jameson}, \textit{Political Unconscious}, \textit{supra} note 24, at 5. See also \textit{id.} at x (relating to Marxist literary interpretation); Rasulov, \textit{supra} note 13, at 642 (advancing an argument with a similar intention—“excavating [From Apology] from beneath the mountain of misreadings and misrememberings under which it has come to be so unceremoniously buried over the last quarter-century”—which also draws on Jameson’s \textit{Political Unconscious}); Singh, \textit{The Critic(al Subject)}, \textit{supra} note 14, at 6 n.28 (making a passing reference to Jameson’s \textit{Political Unconscious}).

\textsuperscript{31} Koskenniemi, \textit{From Apology}, \textit{supra} note 4, at 1.

\textsuperscript{32} \textit{id.} at 58. See \textit{also id.} at 17.

\textsuperscript{33} See \textit{id.} at 16 (”[I]ntellectual operations [which seek to distinguish international law from the sociological and the political] do not leave room for any specifically legal discourse.”).
apology, a mere sociological description ['concreteness']. A law which would base itself on principles which are unrelated to State behaviour, will or interest would seem utopian, incapable of demonstrating its own content in any reliable way ['normativity'].

“Concreteness” and “normativity” are “criteria” for legal “objectivity,” prerequisites for an international law that exists “independently of what anyone might think that the law should be” and “appl[ies] even against a State (or other legal subject) which opposed its application to itself.”

The lesson of From Apology’s chapters two to six—covering fundamental and diverse topics such as sovereignty, the sources of international law and the interpretation of treaties—is that “the structure of international legal discourse on all doctrinal spheres undermine[s] the objectivity on which it constructed itself,” that “law is constantly lapsing into what seems like factual description or political prescription.”

“[T]he legal mind [therefore] fights a battle on two fronts,” trapped between “‘descending’ and ‘ascending’ patterns of justification,” the former “premised on the assumption that a normative code overrides individual State behaviour,” the latter “on the assumption that State behaviour, will and interest are determining of the law.”

“[T]here is [ultimately] no real discourse going on within legal argument . . . but only a patterned exchange of argument” between the two “patterns.” International law does not, therefore, exist in a “specifically ‘legal’ discourse” situated “between the sociological and the political,” but as an oscillation “between the sociological and the political.”

---

34 Id. at 17.
35 Id. at 513.
36 Id.
37 Koskenniemi, FROM APOLOGY, supra note 4, at 515.
38 Id. at 16.
39 Id.
40 Id. at 59.
41 Id. at 511-12.
42 Id. at 1.
43 Koskenniemi, FROM APOLOGY, supra note 4, at 1. See also id. at 65 (“[D]octrine is forced to maintain itself in constant movement from emphasizing concreteness to emphasizing normativity and vice versa without being able to establish itself permanently in either position.”).
The anthropologist Claude Levi-Strauss, following Sigmund Freud’s work on psychoanalysis, recognized that “two traumas . . . are necessary in order to generate the individual myth in which a neurosis consists.” It is the impossibility of finding validation in either “the sociological [or] the political” (first trauma), together with the unavailability of a tenable position between the domains (second trauma), that “generate[s] the . . . myth” of a “specifically ‘legal’ discourse.” Koskenniemi diagnoses international law’s neurosis as “consist[ing]” in that myth, “in” the oscillation between “concreteness” and “normativity.”

Lacan explores the relationship between trauma, myth, and neurosis, mapped by Levi-Strauss, by reevaluating Freud’s case of “The Rat Man.” The parallels between Lacan’s analysis of the Rat Man and Koskenniemi’s analysis of international law are, as we will see, significant.

II. Lacan and the Rat Man

The Rat Man’s father, a soldier, “gambled away the regimental funds,” relied on “a friend” to bail him out, and failed to reimburse the friend, who disappeared. The family remembers and speaks of this “episode in the father’s past” and “a kind of belittlement by his contemporaries permanently follows” him.

---

64 Patrice Maniglier, Acting Out the Structure, in CONCEPT AND FORM VOLUME TWO: INTERVIEWS AND ESSAYS FROM THE CAHIERS POUR L’ANALYSE 25, 41 (Peter Hallward & Knox Peden eds., 2012) (quoting Claude Levi-Strauss, The Structural Study of Myth, in CLAUDE LEVI-STRAUSS, STRUCTURAL ANTHROPOLOGY 228 (1963)). See Koskenniemi, FROM APOLOGY, supra note 4, at 6 n.1, 8 n.4, and 11 n.9 (referring to two of Levi-Strauss’ major works without subjecting them to sustained analysis); see also Caudill, supra note 14, at 670 (discussing structuralism, Levi-Strauss and Lacan); Singh, The Critical Subject, supra note 14, at 3, 10, 14 (suggesting, with reference to Roland Barthes, that “myth” plays an important role in Koskenniemi’s work without, however, defining the specific “myth,” or the function of “myth” as a concept, in Koskenniemi’s work).

65 See Koskenniemi, FROM APOLOGY, supra note 4, at 1.

66 See Maniglier, supra note 44, at 41; see also Frederick J Wertz, Freud’s Case of the Rat Man Revisited: An Existential-Phenomenological and Socio-Historical Analysis, 34 J. PHENOMENOLOGICAL PSYCHOL. 47 (2003) (discussing the case of the Rat Man).

68 Id. at 414.

69 Id. at 411.
As a young man, the father had a “strong attachment . . . to a poor but pretty girl” but he married the woman who would become the Rat Man’s mother because she “occupie[d] a much higher station in the bourgeoisie and [brought him] . . . both the means of livelihood and even the job he [held] at the time they [were] expecting their child.”

When “[the Rat Man’s] father urged him to marry a rich woman [possibly his cousin] the neurosis proper had its onset.” He ordered new glasses for delivery by post from his optician in Vienna, having lost his original glasses at around the time he flirted with “a servant girl . . . during maneuvers.” After losing the glasses an army captain told the Rat Man about a form of punishment in which “a rat stimulated by artificial means is inserted into the rectum of the victim.” Once the glasses arrived the captain told the Rat Man “that he must reimburse Lieutenant A who is in charge of the mail and who is supposed to have paid” for the delivery of the glasses. The charges were, in fact, paid by “[a] generous lady at the post office” rather than Lieutenant A and, in any event, Lieutenant B was responsible for the mail.

To fulfil his self-imposed obligation to the captain the Rat Man devised a plan: “Lieutenant A will reimburse the generous lady at the post office, and, in his presence, she must pay over the sum in question to Lieutenant B and then he himself will reimburse Lieutenant A.” Linked to this neurotic plan, the Rat Man suffered delusional fantasies about the infliction of the rat punishment on his (dead) father or the “servant girl.”

“[T]he neurotic’s individual myth” involved a “phantasmic scenario” of debt, love and punishment in which the Rat Man “re-enact[ed] a ceremony which reproduce[d] almost exactly [the] inaugural relationship” of “the father, the mother, and the friend.” The captain stands in a position similar to that of the father. The Rat Man feels a duty to obey him (the captain) “even though (or, rather, because he knows that) he has no grounds for

---

50 Id. See also Maniglier, supra note 44, at 42.
51 Lacan, Myth, supra note 47, at 411; Maniglier, supra note 44, at 42.
53 Id. at 409.
54 Id. at 412.
55 Id. at 413; see also Maniglier, supra note 44, at 43.
56 Lacan, Myth, supra note 47, at 413.
57 Id. at 412.
58 Id. at 414.
obeying him." The fact that the Rat Man feels compelled to obey the captain/father despite the fact that he feels he/they have no right expect obedience causes him to fantasize about inflicting the rat punishment on his father.

By gambling away the regiment’s money and failing to repay his friend’s loan the father castrated himself. That established a chain of events that led him to marry the rich girl (the Rat Man’s mother) rather than the “poor but pretty girl” he seems to have loved. The father’s (supposedly) poor choices locked the Rat Man into a “perennially unsatisfying turning maneuver” which “never succeeds in closing the loop.” Repaying the debt to the “lady at the post office”/Lieutenant B/Lieutenant A would, in the Rat Man’s neurotic mind, “[close] the loop” by re-writing his/his father’s history, un-castrating both men, restoring their “virility” and allowing them to live according to their own free will, rather than in circumstances dictated by fate and error.

For Lacan, “the wellspring of analytic experience” is the shedding of “more light” on the neurotic’s condition, not by curing the neurosis but by enabling the neurotic to understand the causes of his condition so that he can accept and exist within his structure. The analyst facilitates this process of adjustment by:

[A]ssum[ing] almost surreptitiously, in the symbolic relationship with the subject, the position of... the master—the moral master, the master who initiates the one still in ignorance into the dimension of fundamental human relationships and who opens for 59 Maniglier, supra note 44, at 43.

60 See id.
61 See Lacan, Myth, supra note 47, at 415 (“[T]he frustration, indeed a kind of castration of the father.”).
62 Id.
63 See Jacques Lacan, The Subversion of the Subject and the Dialectic of Desire, in JACQUES LACAN, ÉCRITS 671, 698 (Bruce Fink trans., 2006) (“The Father the neurotic wishes for is clearly the dead Father—that is plain to see. But he is also a Father who would be the perfect master of his desire—which would be just as good, as far as the subject is concerned.”).
65 Id. at 425.
66 See id. at 407.
him what one might call the way to moral consciousness, even to wisdom, in assuming the human condition.67

Lacan’s analysis of the Rat Man’s neurosis maps onto Koskenniemi’s analysis of international law’s relationship with sociology/apology vs. politics/utopia, leading to two key conclusions. First, that Koskenniemi treats international law as a neurotic patient and, second, that in doing so he becomes international law’s analyst/’master.’68

Koskenniemi’s four-part, two-group structure of sociology/apology and politics/utopia can be represented thus:

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Politics (“the political”)</th>
<th>Sociology (“the sociological”)</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>Utopia</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>Apology</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

This mirrors—indeed, the above diagram is based on the structure of—this representation, by Patrice Maniglier, of the Rat Man’s “[f]amilial [c]omplex”.69

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Father</th>
<th>Wife</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>Friend</td>
<td>Poor Woman</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

Merging the two diagrams above makes the parallels between the Rat Man’s neurosis and international law’s neurotic condition clear:

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Politics/Father</th>
<th>Sociology/Wife</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>Utopia/Friend</td>
<td>Apology/Poor Woman</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

67 Id. at 407–08.

68 See David Kennedy, The Last Treatise, supra note 5, at 991 (“I continue to be struck . . . by the relative scarcity of work picking up, reworking, extending, or contesting the broad argument of From Apology to Utopia . . . Martti’s book is rarely challenged or deeply engaged . . . I often have the feeling that the book’s symbolic meaning has somehow overtaken its analysis.”); Jan Klabbers, Towards a Culture of Formalism? Martti Koskenniemi and the Virtues, 27 TEMPLE INT’L & COMP. L.J. 417, 418 (2016) (commenting on Kennedy’s review of From Apology: “From Apology to Utopia, or Koskenniemi’s work in general, is treated as the gospel, the final word marking, as Fukuyama might be tempted to put it, “the end of history.” (citation omitted)); Singh, The Critic(al Subject), supra note 14, at 11 (“The image we see in From Apology to Utopia is that of a critic who aspires to less domination as his ideal, all the while constantly perpetuating a form of domination himself.”).

69 Maniglier, supra note 44, at 42.
“Normativity” and “concreteness” might be added to the picture as synonyms for utopia and apology but that does nothing to disturb the four-part, two-group structure.

Politics is the unsatisfied, dead father who would have his son (international law) be a real man, bending the world to his will. The unachievability of this ambition is reflected in the connection Koskenniemi establishes between politics and utopia; utopia is, by definition, a non-place, a dead father. The parallel between utopia for international law and the friend in the story of the Rat Man is established by the fact that the friend has vanished; the son/Rat Man cannot repay the debt to him, even if he wants to, because he cannot find him, in the same way that international law is unable to find utopia.

Sociology is international law’s wife/mother. The story of the Rat Man is permeated by a sense that the father married the wrong woman. The tacit argument in the family’s history is that if he were a “real man” he would have married the “poor but pretty girl,” found money and status for himself rather than through marriage, and secured utopia rather than settling for an apology of a marriage. International law’s relationship with sociology—with the concrete reality of the world—is similarly apologetic. To accept the world as it is, rather than as you would have it be, is to deny utopia and castrate yourself in the interests of an easy life.

International law, like the Rat Man, cannot satisfy its father (politics), cannot find its missing friend/“true” lover (utopia), and, by satisfying its mother/wife (sociology), apologizes for its lack of virility. Faced with no choice outside of this utopia/apology structure, international law/the Rat Man “makes a perennially unsatisfying turning maneuver and never succeeds in closing the loop”:70

The dynamics of international legal argument is provided by the contradiction between the ascending and descending patterns of argument and the inability to prefer either. Reconciliatory doctrines will reveal themselves as either incoherent or making a silent preference... doctrine is forced to maintain itself in constant movement from emphasizing concreteness to emphasizing normativity and vice-versa without being able to establish itself permanently in either position.71

---

70 Lacan, Myth, supra note 47, at 415.

71 Koskenniemi, FROM APOLOGY, supra note 4, at 65 (emphasis in original).
Lacan’s analysis of the Rat Man revises Freud’s theory of the structural causes of neurosis. As David Macey explains, Freud understood neurosis as a result of children being unable to make the “difficult transition from an immediate relationship with the mother” into “a triangular situation” that also included “the father.” Lacan prefers a four-part structure, with an “emphasis...on more abstract and universal structures of kinship and alliance,” to Freud’s two-part structure of mother/father and his emphasis on the “family.”

Lacan’s preference is explained by his debt to Levi-Strauss. As Macey explains, Levi-Strauss applied Ferdinand de Saussure’s and, in particular, Roman Jakobson’s work on the structure of language, to the study of culture. For Jakobson, “a phoneme is a basic unit of signification...a [purely] differential unit,” a form without content or fixed meaning. Levi-Strauss adopts this concept of the “phoneme” in his analysis of the prohibition on incest as “an empty but indispensable form, making both possible and necessary the articulation of biological groups in a network of exchange that allows them to communicate with one another.” Maniglier charts Levi-Strauss’s application of this structural-linguistic understanding of human behavior to the study of myth and neurosis, noting the connection with Lacan’s Rat Man analysis.

Macey’s and Maniglier’s analysis of the links between Saussure and Jakobson (linguistics), Levi-Strauss (anthropology), and Lacan (psychoanalysis) situates neurosis as a product of the neurotic’s troubled relationship with his mythical structure. The patient’s behavior—in the context of sovereignty doctrine, or questions about the nature of customary 72 See Maniglier, supra note 44, at 41–46.

---

74 Id. at xxiii.
75 See id. at xxiii–xxv.
76 See DOUZINAS, supra note 14, at 301 (“Jacques Lacan...turned Freud’s story [about the origins of law in murder, crime, and violence] into a mythical structure and...read it, in a way similar to Levi-Strauss’s explanation of the elementary structures of kinship.”).
77 See Macey, supra note 73, at xxiii.
78 Id. at xxiii.
79 Id. at xxiv.
80 Maniglier, supra note 44, at 39–46. See also Lacan, Subversion, supra note 63, at 676–77 (on his work, Freud, Saussure and Jakobson).
international law, for example—can be understood through “kinship” ties to father, mother, wife, friend and lover/politics, sociology, utopia and apology.

In From Apology Koskenniemi diagnoses international law’s neurosis, “initiat[ing] the one still in ignorance”—international law itself—“into the dimension of fundamental . . . relationships . . . open[ing] . . . what one might call the way to moral consciousness, even to wisdom, in assuming the [international legal] . . . condition.”81 From Apology allows international law(yers) to “[assume] the [international legal] . . . condition” by encouraging it/them to live with(in) international law’s “mythic network.”82 Koskenniemi’s “project is to try to revive a sense of [international law’s] original mission, its importance. I suspect I am creating a myth (for it probably never was much better)—but myth-creation is an important aspect of political activity and activism.”83

From Apology maps the “twisted relations” between “normativity” and “concreteness,” tracing the “echoes” of the double trauma of pursuing sociological and political validation across “all [of international law’s] doctrinal spheres.”84 This mapping leads to the conclusion that “there is no real discourse going on in international legal argument but only a patterned exchange of argument,”85 and that means that “recourse to equity, good faith and the like” is “less a cause for despair than for hope.”86 “[T]he objectivist dream [of a determinative discourse] was faulted from the outset” and “lawyers [therefore] need to take seriously their unconscious shift into arguing from moral obligation.”87 The international lawyer remains “constrained . . . inasmuch as he experiences the conflicting pull of the criticisms of [his “kinship” with wife/mother/sociology/concreteness/] apology and [his “kinship” with father/politics/friend/lover/normativity/] utopia, [but] he is not

82 Id. 415.

84 Maniglier, supra note 44, at 41. (“[It is not an isolated event which can be traumatizing but rather the kind of twisted relations that it bears with another event, which it echoes . . . by transforming it in a way which then makes it impossible for it not to be endlessly repeated.”); KOSKENNIEMI, FROM APOLOGY, supra note 4, at 515 (“[A]ll doctrinal spheres” - emphasis in original).

85 KOSKENNIEMI, FROM APOLOGY, supra note 4, at 511.

86 Id. at 511, 515.

87 Id. at 515.
fully so.” There is a limited freedom for the international lawyer, but only within the “kinship” structure.

In “Between Commitment and Cynicism,” his most overtly psychological text, Koskenniemi notes that while utopianism attracts practitioners to international law experience moves them towards cynicism. International lawyers cannot be entirely “genuine” in their commitment to international law, rejecting any and all cynicism, because “an unwavering belief in its intrinsic goodness” is untenable. We are left with the consolation prize of the “light” that psychoanalysis shines onto the condition of international lawyers, illuminating our neurotic place in international law’s (mythical) structure.

III. International Law “As a Language”

Language both in its structure and action is homologous with the law . . . “the law of man has been the law of language since the first words of recognition.”

[T]he unconscious is structured as a language.

88 Id. at 549.

89 See Beckett, supra note 9, at 1087 (”[L]aw is not our tool; we are constructs of international legality”) (emphasis in original).

91 Id. at 497 (“I shall aim at providing a somewhat impressionistic sketch of the structure of the psychological positions available to international law practitioners.”).

92 Id. at 498, 502–06.

93 Id. at 497.

95 DOUZINAS, supra note 14, 305 (quoting Jacques Lacan, The Function and Field of Speech and Language in Psychoanalysis, in JACQUES LACAN, ÉCRITS 197, 225 (Bruce Fink trans., 2006)) (using a different version of Lacan’s text).

’structured’ and ‘as a language’ for me mean exactly the same thing.\textsuperscript{97}

Understanding international law, in Koskenniemi’s terms, “as a language” does not offer normative clarity in particular cases,\textsuperscript{98} nor is it possible to explain the content of the language through particular events or concrete facts. À la Saussure’s theory of language, international legal “[m]eaning is not . . . present in the expression itself” but “relational.”\textsuperscript{99} International legal words or terms “are somehow self-defining,”\textsuperscript{100} “like holes in a net . . . [e]ach empty in itself . . . identified only through the strings which separate it from the neighbouring holes.”\textsuperscript{101} “Knowing a language—understanding the meaning of words—is to be capable of operating these differentiations,”\textsuperscript{102} and it is “the feeling of the native speaker which remains . . . the test of the presence or absence of distinctive features.”\textsuperscript{103}

Koskenniemi’s Saussurean approach distinguishes between “the system of differences within which the meaning of speech-acts is constituted,” or “\textit{langue},” and “individual, historical speech-acts,” or “\textit{paroles},” focusing on the former (“\textit{langue}”) as the structurally determinative force in language and discourse.\textsuperscript{104} A prioritization of present system (“the synchronic”) over past acts (“the diachronic”) defines Saussurean linguistics, according to Fredric Jameson,\textsuperscript{105} “[T]he synchronic” is concerned with “the immediate lived experience

\textsuperscript{97} Id.

\textsuperscript{98} KOSKENNIEMI, FROM APOLOGY, supra note 4, at 568 (emphasis in original).

\textsuperscript{99} Id. at 8–9. See also id., at 8 n.4 (inviting the reader to “[s]ee generally Saussure (Course)“); FERDINAND DE SAUSSURE, COURSE IN GENERAL LINGUISTICS 9 (Charles Bally & Albert Sechehaye eds., Wade Baskin trans., 1966):

But what is language [\textit{langue}]? It is not to be confused with human speech [\textit{langage}], of which it is only a definite part . . . It is both a social product of the faculty of speech and a collection of necessary conventions that have been adopted by a social body to permit individuals to exercise that faculty.

\textsuperscript{100} JAMESON, PRISON-HOUSE, supra note 1, at 17.

\textsuperscript{101} KOSKENNIEMI, FROM APOLOGY, supra note 4, at 9.

\textsuperscript{102} Id. at 9.

\textsuperscript{103} JAMESON, PRISON-HOUSE, supra note 1, at 17.

\textsuperscript{104} KOSKENNIEMI, FROM APOLOGY, supra note 4, at 7.

\textsuperscript{105} See JAMESON, PRISON-HOUSE, supra note 1, at 3–39.
of the native speaker”¹⁰⁶ or, as Macey puts it, “the dimension in which language exists as a system.”¹⁰⁷ From Apology is a synchronic, internal, linguistic account of international law’s ontology and practice; an account of international law “as a language,” “a system of production of good legal arguments,” written by and from the perspective of a “native language-speaker.”¹⁰⁸ Diachrony,” the antithesis of synchrony, “is the historical dimension in which languages evolve.”¹⁰⁹ It “rests on a kind of intellectual construction, the result of comparisons between one moment of lived time and another by someone who stands outside . . . substitut[ing] a purely intellectual continuity for a lived one.”¹¹⁰

Lacan, like Saussure, prefers the synchronic to the diachronic:

A psychoanalyst should find it easy to grasp the fundamental distinction between signifier and signified . . . The first network, that of the signifier, is the synchronic structure of the material of language insofar as each element takes on its precise usage therein by being different from the others; this is the principle of distribution that alone regulates the function of the elements of language [langue] at its different levels, from the phonemic pair of oppositions to compound expressions, the task of the most modern research being to isolate the stable forms of the latter. The second network, that of the signified, is the diachronic set of concretely pronounced discourses, which historically affects the first network, just as the structure of the first governs the pathways of the second. What dominates here is the unity of signification, which turns out to never come down to a pure indication of reality [réel], but always refers to another signification. In other words, signification comes about only on the basis of taking things as a ¹⁰⁶ Id. at 6 (emphasis added).

¹⁰⁷ Macey, supra note 73, at xxiii.
¹⁰⁸ KOSKENNIEMI, FROM APOLOGY, supra note 4, at 568.
¹⁰⁹ Macey, supra note 73, at xxiii.
¹¹⁰ JAMESON, PRISON-HOUSE, supra note 1, at 6.
whole [d’ensemble] . . . . The signifier alone guarantees the theoretical coherence of the whole.\(^\text{111}\)

The signifier, which Lacan associates with the synchronic, is that which signifies—language. The signified is that which is signified by language—"reality." Lacan represents the relationship between signifier (‘S’) and signified (‘s’) thus:\(^\text{112}\)

\[
\frac{S}{s}
\]

The point, here, is that "linguistics" as a "science is . . . based, in effect, on the primordial position of the signifier and the signified as distinct orders initially separated by a barrier resisting signification."\(^\text{113}\) Because "no signification can be sustained except by reference to another signification,"\(^\text{114}\) because "there is no existing language [langue] whose ability to cover the field of the signified can be called into question,"\(^\text{115}\) and because the notion that "the signifier serves . . . the function of representing the signified, or better, that the signifier in fact enters the signified . . . in a form which, since it is not immaterial, raises the question of its place in reality."\(^\text{117}\) As Yannis Stavrakakis explains, for Lacan "meaning is produced by signifiers; it springs from the signifier to the signified and not vice versa (as argued by realist representationalism)."\(^\text{118}\)

\(^{113}\) Id. at 415.

\(^{114}\) Id. (citation omitted).

\(^{115}\) Id.

\(^{116}\) Id. at 416

\(^{117}\) Id. at 417.

Lacan draws extensively on Saussure’s work but “deviate[s] from the Saussurian model.”

“The primacy of the signifier is not an idea found in Saussure’s work”, indeed, as Michel Borch-Jacobsen explains, “Saussure’s langue”—which Koskenniemi defines in terms of a “controlling legal langue, the conditions of what can acceptably be said within [international law], or what it is possible to think or believe in it” — “does not gain entry into Lacan’s doctrine before having been emptied of all representative functions.”

Saussure’s concept of the relationship between signifier and signified, in contrast to the diagram (‘S’ and ‘s’) above depicting Lacan’s concept, can be represented thus.

As Dany Nobus explains:

The most conspicuous difference between Saussure’s and Lacan’s diagrams concerns the positions of the signifier and the signified relative to the bar that separates them. Whereas in Saussure’s schema, the signified and the signifier are located above and beneath the bar respectively, in Lacan’s version their position has been interchanged. Secondly, whereas Saussure’s diagram suggests if not an equivalence, at least a parallelism between the signified and the signifier, owing to the similarity with which they are

---

120 Id.

121 KOSKENNIIEMI, FROM APOLOGY, supra note 4, at 11 (emphasis in original).

graphically inscribed above and beneath the bar, Lacan’s algorithm underscores visually the incompatibility of the two terms. For in Lacan’s formula the signifier is written with an upper-case letter (S) and the signified appears in lower-case type (s), and is italicized (s).

The signified does not feature in From Apology. It is a Lacanian inquiry into the internal “dynamics” of international legal argument, and it understands international law as a pure signifier with (Lacanian) “primacy” over the signified.

IV. “[F]rom Structure to Subject”

Despite its emphasis on the perspective of the “native speaker,” international law’s synchronic language is “prior” to the subject. The lawyer/subject is an “effect” of the structure: “The very relation [he] has to [him]self must be rooted in the impossibility of coinciding with [him]self.”

125 See Rasulov, supra note 13, at 656–63 (commenting, without reference to Lacan or the connection between Lacan and Saussure, on Saussurean linguistics and From Apology’s focus on the signifier).

126 See Koskenniemi, FROM APOLOGY, supra note 4, at 58.

127 See id. at 13 (“By providing an ‘insider’s view’ to international legal discourse.”); see also David Kennedy, Apology to Utopia, supra note 17, at 386 (“[R]ather than applying criticisms developed by other fields or writing from a viewpoint outside international law, [Koskenniemi] produces a criticism that is internal and, ultimately, situated in the best traditions of the discipline.”); Carty, supra note 14, at 864 (“[B]eyond Wittgenstein-style language games there is no reality, no referent.”); Rasulov, supra note 13, at 642 (“[F]rom Apology’s most important theoretical legacy [is] a highly novel and very powerful argument in defence of the anti-anti-disciplinarian theoretical agenda in the field of academic international legal studies” - emphasis in original).

129 Maniglier, supra note 44, at 27. See also Yves Durox, Strong Structuralism, Weak Subject, in CONCEPT AND FORM VOLUME TWO: INTERVIEWS AND ESSAYS FROM THE CAHIERS POUR L’ANALYSE 187, 199–200 (Peter Hallward & Knox Peden eds., 2012).

130 Maniglier, supra note 44, at 27. See also DOUZINAS, supra note 14, at 304 (“I must identify with my image in the mirror and with my name... I must accept division and negativity, I must accept that I am what I am not, in [Arthur] Rimbaud’s felicitous phrase that ‘Je est un autre.’”).
The statement “I am an international lawyer” is circular and meaningless without international law’s structure. The international lawyer is “a paradoxical entity” that “can only constitute itself as being different from itself; its very identity is to escape itself.” The subject/international lawyer “escape[s] itself” by subjecting itself to international law’s linguistic structure. This is the Lacanian meaning of the statement “I am an international lawyer;” “[t]he subject speaks and comes into existence by being spoken in language, in other words by being alienated one more time from bodily and sensory experience into the cold world of the sign.”

From Apology moves “from structure to subject” because the structure has “prior[ity].” It does this by identifying the longed-for “specifically ‘legal’ discourse” as a myth, by mapping neurotic efforts to validate the myth in a search for “concreteness” and “normativity,” and by exploring viable modes of practice within the linguistic structure that myth and neurosis create:

[L]awyers’ expectations of certainty should be downgraded...they—as well as States and statesmen—must take seriously the moral-political choices they are faced with when arguing ‘within the law’ and accept the consequence that in some relevant 131 Maniglier, supra note 44, at 27 (“[T]he rationale for such a paradoxical definition of subjectivity has to do with the problem of the relation between being and subjectivity. Does it make sense to say that “I” am . . . is it possible to apply the category of truth to the subject of knowledge itself?” – emphasis in original). See also Ernesto Laclau, Power and Representation, in ERNESTO LACLAU, EMANCIPATION(s) 84, 92 (2007) (“The hegemonic subject cannot have a terrain of constitution different from the structure to which it belongs.”).

132 Maniglier, supra note 44, at 28.

Structuralism argued that the systematic form of language, rather than the particular linguistic elements of actual spoken words, gave rise to intelligibility...the role of the speaker as agent was displaced. The speaker was now dependent on language itself to engage in meaningful activities.... The subject was better understood as a product of culture, an identity created in language, a potentiality limited by the language that defined the conventions of a world.

See also KOSKENNIMI, FROM APOLOGY, supra note 4, at 7 n.1 (describing Heller’s article as “useful”).

134 DOUZINAS, supra note 14, at 303.

135 Miller, supra note 128, at 74.
sense the choices are theirs and that they therefore should be responsible for them.\footnote{Koskenniemi, From Apology, supra note 4, at 536.}

V. Structure/Subject/Suture

If, as Lacan’s collaborator and editor Jacques-Alain Miller maintains, “[s]tructure [is] that which puts in place an experience for the subject that it includes” then structures are existentially dependent on the “inclu[ision]” of a subject.\footnote{Miller, supra note 128, at 71.} Without a declaration of subjectivity the subject features in the structure only as a “lack,” as something that is “lacking . . . [but] not purely and simply absent.”\footnote{Id. at 93.} “Suture” expresses “lack” in this sense, by “nam[ing] the relation of the subject to the chain of its discourse.”\footnote{Id.} By declaring its subjectivity the subject “stand[s]-in” or “tak[es]-the-place-of” the subject that the structure originally lacked,\footnote{See id.} occupying the space that the structure held open for it.\footnote{See Laclau, Power, supra note 131, at 92 (“T]he structure is not fully reconciled with itself . . . it is inhabited by an original lack, by a radical undecidability that needs to be constantly superseded by acts of decision. These acts are precisely what constitute the subject, who can only exist as a will transcending the structure.”); see also Slavoj Žižek, Class Struggle or Postmodernism? Yes Please, In Judith Butler, Ernesto Laclau & Slavoj Žižek, Contingency, Hegemony, Universality: Contemporary Dialogues on the Left 90, 119 (2000) (“F]or Lacan, the subject prior to subjectivization is not some Idealist pseudo-Cartesian self-presence preceding material interpellatory practice and apparatuses, but the very gap in the structure that the imaginary (mis)recognition in the interpellatory Call endeavours to fill in.”); Singh, The Critic(al Subject), supra note 14, at 9 and 12, wrestles with the relationship between subject and structure in Koskenniemi’s work without reference to “suture” or discussion of its place in the broader Lacanian/Laclauian framework and is, consequently, unable to grasp the dialectical, mutually constitutive relationship between subject and structure in Koskenniemi’s work. This leads to the (in my view) mistaken conclusion – on which see infra note 152 – that “the absolute free and empty subject is presupposed by Koskenniemi’s critique”. Id. at 13.} Ernesto Laclau evokes this notion of a sutured subject, asserting “the subject who takes the decision is only partially a subject; he is also a background of sedimented practices organizing a normative framework which operates as a limitation on the horizon of options.”\footnote{Laclau, Identity and Hegemony, supra note 124, at 82.} From Apology’s international lawyer is sutured into the structure, “stand[ing]-in” the structure’s prefabricated subject-space.
The possibilities of “critical lawyer[ing],” of a “critical politics which does not need to rely on utopian justice nor become an apology of actual power,” are defined by the structure. International legal practice “is not the application of ready-made, general rules or principles but a conversation about what to do, here and now.” “Uncertainty and choice are an ineradicable part of [international legal] practice” because the notion that international law provides unambiguous, ready-made solutions to conflicts involves an “objectification mistake,” treating law as a (definite, defined) object when it is, in fact, an (ambiguous, interpretable) social construct.

International lawyers are not only entitled but obliged to make political choices which resolve legal disputes in line with their “authentic commitment” to international law, their “integrity as . . . lawyer[s].” Being an “authentic,” committed international lawyer “is [to exist in] the distance between the undecidability of the structure and the decision,” to live with(in) international law’s neurosis, with(in) the search for

\[\text{143 Koskenniemi, From Apology, supra note 4, at 548.}\]
\[\text{144 Id. at 539.}\]
\[\text{146 Koskenniemi, From Apology, supra note 4, at 544.}\]
\[\text{147 Id. at 555, 537.}\]
\[\text{148 See id. at 537–48.}\]
\[\text{149 Id. at 546-47. See also Koskenniemi, Between Commitment and Cynicism, supra note 90, at 512 (“It is, I believe, precisely [the] sense of doubt, uncertainty, and occasional schizophrenia . . . that is in the background when international lawyers describe their practice in terms of a commitment, instead of, say, a knowledge or a faith” – emphasis in original); id. at 508 (“The law brings the committed lawyer to the brink of the [legal] decision, but never quite into it. If a civil strife arises, the law tells the lawyer: ‘Here are two rules, “self-determination” and “uti possidetis.” Now choose.’”).}\]
\[\text{150 Koskenniemi, From Apology, supra note 4, at 555. See also Koskenniemi, Between Commitment and Cynicism, supra note 90, at 498–99:}\]

To be a voice for no particular interests or position is not a lucrative affair; it calls for commitment! . . . This aspect of commitment has to do with the avoidance of politics, prejudice and everything else that appears as external, as strictly outside the law and is often described in terms of the good lawyer’s particular ‘integrity.’

\[\text{151 Laclau, Identity and Hegemony, supra note 124, at 79.}\]
“concreteness” and “normativity,” by “get[ting] over” the idea that we ought to have found a “specifically ‘legal’ discourse” by now.\footnote{152}

Koskenniemi’s psychoanalysis of international law is, ultimately, a psychoanalysis of international lawyers also. International law and international lawyers are inseparable because the international legal subject is sutured into the linguistic structure.\footnote{153}

C. Therapy

I. Hegemony

From Apology is an argument for the hegemony of the international lawyer as a therapeutic response to international law’s neurosis.\footnote{154} It advocates political decision-making by international lawyers within international law’s linguistic structure as the form of legal practice most appropriate in a fragmented, global socio-political context.\footnote{155}

\footnote{152} Aristodemou, supra note 14, at 37 (“get over”); Koskenniemi, From Apology, supra note 4, at 1 (“specifically ‘legal’ discourse”). See Laclau, Power, supra note 131, at 89 (“[A] contingent intervention taking place in an undecidable terrain is . . . a hegemonic intervention.”). See also Koskenniemi, From Apology, supra note 4, at 553 (discussing the international lawyer’s “role”); Prost, Born Again Lawyer, supra note 11, at 1039 (“[P]art of what From Apology does is illustrate how there is no such thing as an ‘objective’ system of international law, i.e. an autonomous law which judges can ‘find’ and use as a non political device for settling disputes, and which students can learn ‘as it is.’”); Singh, Koskenniemi’s Images, supra note 29. I disagree with Singh when he concludes that “the Sartrean subject [is] at the heart of From Apology to Utopia,” claims that “the absolute free and empty subject is presupposed by Koskenniemi’s critique,” and argues that “[s]he [the international lawyer] is able to briefly separate herself from the grounds of her own construction.” Id. at 710, 714, 724. Koskenniemi, From Apology, supra note 4, is, in my view, and as explained above, based on a Lacanian understanding of the sutured relationship between subject and structure.

\footnote{153} See Koskenniemi, Gentle Civilizer, supra note 6, at 7 (“It may be too much to say that international law is only what international lawyers do or think. But at least it is that” – emphasis in original); Justin Desautels-Stein, From Apology to Utopia’s Point of Attack, 29 Leiden J. Int’l L. 677, 687 (2016): From Apology to Utopia suggested that it may very well be impossible to ‘think’ outside of [the] structure of legal thought, and if this was the case, then an understanding of the menu of such structures clued us in to the availability of different ways of conceptualizing the international legal order.

\footnote{154} See Koskenniemi, From Apology, supra note 4, at 13 (referring to “a therapeutic effect on lawyers”).

\footnote{155} See Ernesto Laclau & Chantal Mouffe, Hegemony and Socialist Strategy: Towards a Radical Democratic Politics x (2d ed. 2001) (“Our approach is grounded in privileging the moment of political articulation, and the central category of political analysis is, in our view, hegemony” – emphasis in original); see also Martti Koskenniemi, “By Their Acts You Shall Know Them . . . (and Not By Their Legal Theories), 15 Eur. J. Int’l L.* 839, 851 (2004) (“[A]ll law (and not just semantically unclear law) is infected by indeterminacy. There is, in this sense, no middle-of-the-road
In Hegemony and Socialist Strategy Ernesto Laclau and Chantal Mouffe define hegemony as "appear[ing]" in the “context” of a “fault (in the geological sense) . . . a fissure that had to be filled up . . . a contingency that had to be overcome."\(^{156}\) Hegemony is something that “fills a space left vacant by a crisis of what . . . should have been a normal historical development,”\(^{157}\) and it “supposes a theoretical field dominated by the category of articulation.\(^{158}\)

Laclau and Mouffe define “articulation” as “any practice establishing a relation among elements such that their identity is modified as a result of the articulatory practice,”\(^{159}\) explaining that “[t]he structured totality resulting from the articulatory practice” is a “discourse.”\(^{160}\) “[E]lements” are “floating signifiers, incapable of being wholly articulated to a discursive chain,”\(^{161}\) and “articulation” involves “the transition from ‘elements’ to ‘moments,’”\(^{162}\) for all that this “transition” is “never entirely fulfilled.”\(^{163}\) “[M]oments” are defined as the “differential positions . . . articulated within a discourse,”\(^{164}\) arguments formed out of a particular arrangement of “elements,” and “articulation” ultimately “consists in the construction of nodal points which partially fix meaning,”\(^{165}\) of “points de capiton . . . privileged signifiers that fix the meaning of a signifying chain.”\(^{166}\)

solution at all: even one that initially seems such, is an occasionalist reliance on a momentarily hegemonic solution” – emphasis in original); Desautels-Stein, Point of Attack, supra note 153, at 680–81 (“From Apology to Utopia sought to uncover practices of international legal argument in order to assist the international community in better understanding the structured relationship between international law and international politics.”)

156 LACLAU AND MOUFFE, HEGEMONY, supra note 155, at 8.

157 Id. at 48.

158 Id. at 93 (emphasis in original).

159 Id. at 105. See also Caudill, supra note 14, at 673 (“[A]rticulation is always an approximation of truth.”).

160 LACLAU & MOUFFE, HEGEMONY, supra note 155, at 105.

161 Id. at 113.

162 Id. at 110.

163 Id.

164 Id. at 105.

165 Id. at 112.

166 LACLAU & MOUFFE, HEGEMONY, supra note 155, at 113.
“Articulatory practice” is “possible” only because of the “incomplete,” “contingent” nature of discourse, the impossibility of fixing ultimate meanings, the fact that no discursive formulation is a sutured totality, and because moments are never entirely fulfilled. Subjects take up “subject positions” within a discursive structure by suturing themselves into it, and practice hegemony as “a political type of relation, a form of politics” a “game” played through “articulatory practice” in conditions of contingency and ambiguity, social division and antagonism. “[H]egemonic articulation” takes place in a climate of “antagonism” and “equivalence,” on the basis that society is neither “totally possible,” because of irresolvable antagonisms between “subject positions,” nor “totally impossible” because of commonalities or equivalences between “subject positions.”

International law “should, in the course of its normal historical development,” have become a “specifically ‘legal’ discourse [situated] between the sociological [its mother] and the political [its father].” It did not, and that failure left it in a contingent, neurotic state. From Apology argues for hegemonic “articulatory practice” as the appropriate methodological response to the fact that the son (international law) is a young adult who did not enjoy a “normal historical development,” a healthy adolescence. He is, therefore,

167 Id. at 110-11.
168 Id. at 111.
169 Id. at 106.
170 Id. at 110.
171 Id. at 115; Id. at 47, 88 n.1 ("The concept of ‘suture’ . . . is taken from psychoanalysis. Its explicit formulation is attributed to Jacques Alain-Miller . . . although it implicitly operates in the whole of Lacanian theory. It is used to designate the production of the subject on the basis of the chain of its discourse."). For discussion of “suture,” see supra Section B. V., “Structure/subject/suture.”
172 LACLAU & MOUFFE, HEGEMONY, supra note 155, at 139.
173 Id.
174 Id. at 122–34.
175 Id. at 129. See also Laclau, Identity and Hegemony, supra note 124, at 74 ("An always open intertextuality is the ultimately undecidable terrain in which hegemonic logics operate.").
176 LACLAU AND MOUFFE, HEGEMONY, supra note 155, at 48.
177 KOSKENNIEMI, FROM APOLOGY, supra note 4, at 1. On sociology as “mother” and politics as “father,” see supra Section B. II., “Lacan and the Rat Man.”
unable to satisfy both his mother (sociology) and his father (politics), largely because he has still not moved out of the family home and found a place of his own:

Normative imagination—reasoned folly—must take over where legal interpretation left off. As international lawyers, we have failed to use the imaginative possibilities open to us. We were cast as players in game, members in somebody’s team. It is not that we need to play the game better, or more self-consciously. We need to re-imagine the game, reconstruct its rules, redistribute the prizes.\(^ {178}\)

\textit{From Apology’s sotto voce} message seems to be that the “game” can be “re-imagine[d]” as hegemony, and Koskenniemi makes this almost explicit in a 2004 article arguing for an understanding of international law “as a hegemonic technique.”\(^ {179}\)

My point, in tracing the origins of Koskenniemi’s argument for international legal practice as hegemony back to the original publication of \textit{From Apology} in 1989, is that hegemony has been the foundation of Koskenniemi’s work from the beginning, and that it did not arrive as a mere add-on sometime around 2004. Beyond questions of timing, however, a more subtle and important point concerning Koskenniemi’s treatment of the relationship between hegemony and international law also needs to be made.

Koskenniemi associates hegemony with “an argumentative practice in which particular subjects and values claim to represent that which is universal,”\(^ {180}\) placing particular emphasis on the “objective[s] of the contestants,”\(^ {181}\) on the arguments advanced by states,\(^ {182}\) and on the notion that “[p]rofessional competence in international law is precisely about being able to identify the moment’s hegemonic and counter-hegemonic narratives and to list one’s services in favour of one or the other.”\(^ {183}\) While he highlights

\[^{178}\text{Koskenniemi, } \text{From Apology, supra note 4, at 560–61.}\]
\[^{180}\text{Martti Koskenniemi, What is International Law For?, in International Law 29, 46 (Malcolm D. Evans ed., 4d ed. 2014).}\]
\[^{182}\text{Koskenniemi, A Reconfiguration, supra note 179.}\]
\[^{183}\text{Id. at 202.}\]
international law’s function as “a hegemonic politics,”¹⁸⁴ he does not present his argument as an argument for the hegemony of the international lawyer.

Hegemony, as a form of political practice, is compatible with, even produced by, deconstruction—recalling Koskenniemi’s description of From Apology’s “approach” as “deconstructive.”¹⁸⁵ For Laclau, “deconstruction discovers the role of the decision out of the undecidability of the structure”—in our context, out of the fact that international law is neither “concrete,” nor “normative,” nor can it find and occupy a space between the two—with “hegemony as a theory of the decision taken in [the] undecidable terrain” that deconstruction unveils.¹⁸⁶

Through “deconstruction” Koskenniemi reveals “the contingent character of the connections existing in [international law’s] terrain.”¹⁸⁷ He does this by, for example, showing that international legal doctrine on sovereignty and the sources of international law can be analyzed with equal validity from opposing “ascending” and “descending” perspectives.¹⁸⁸ “Deconstruction” creates the space for sutured international lawyers to make legal arguments qua political decisions.¹⁸⁹ If the structure or discourse does not have the answer international lawyers are free to make “contingent, precarious, . . . pragmatic” political arguments within the discourse.¹⁹⁰

In making political decisions, in “aiming to act as . . . ‘genuine republican[s]’ encompassing the perspective of the whole,”¹⁹¹ international lawyers are “burden[ed] . . . with the ¹⁸⁴ Id. at 214.

¹⁸⁵ Koskenniemi, FROM APOLOGY, supra note 4, at 6–14.
¹⁸⁶ Laclau, Power, supra note 131, at 90. I disagree with Sahib Singh when he claims that Koskenniemi’s From Apology is a work of “structuralism” rather than “deconstruction,” insofar as he implies an either/or relationship between structuralism and deconstruction. See Sahib Singh, International Legal Positivism and New Approaches to International Law, in INTERNATIONAL LEGAL POSITIVISM IN A POST-MODERN WORLD 291, 296–97 (Jörg Kammerhofer & Jean d’Aspremont eds., 2014).
¹⁸⁷ Laclau, Power, supra note 131, at 90.
¹⁸⁸ See Koskenniemi, FROM APOLOGY, supra note 4, 224–302, 303–87.
¹⁸⁹ See Laclau, Power, supra note 131, at 92 (“[T]he structure is not fully reconciled with itself . . . it is inhabited by an original lack . . . by a radical undecidability that needs to be constantly superseded by acts of decision.”).
¹⁹⁰ Id. at 90.
¹⁹¹ Martti Koskenniemi, Constitutionalism as Mindset: Reflections on Kantian Themes About International Law and Globalization, 8 THEORETICAL INQUIRIES IN LAW 9, 31 (2007).
impossible task of making [global] democratic interaction achievable.”192 They are “hegemonic” precisely because they are “not closed in a narrow corporatist perspective,”193 not wholly apologetic for the current distribution of power, opportunity and wealth, “but [present themselves] as realizing the broader [utopian] aims either of emancipating or ensuring order for wider masses of the [global] population.”194 It is in this sense international lawyers are, collectively, The Gentle Civilizer of Nations,195 and taking that as his title, Koskenniemi develops the argument for hegemonic practice further in his second book.

II. Structuralism, Synchrony, and the “Move to History”

Koskenniemi tells us that Gentle Civilizer “move[s] from structure”—From Apology’s concern—“to history” through “intuitively plausible and politically engaged narratives about the emergence and gradual transformation of a profession that plays with the reader’s empathy,”196 and by “infus[ing] the study of international law with a sense of historical motion and political, even personal, struggle.”197 Another way to characterize the book would be to say that, consistent with From Apology’s concept of international law as a structure or discourse, Gentle Civilizer focuses on the “articulatory practice” of particular (sutured) subjects—Jellinek, Kelsen, Scelle, and Lauterpacht,198 for example—and that this is “a story of kings . . . and the achievements of the great,”199 and quite deliberately not a story of the forgotten, ignored and marginalized.200

192 Ernesto Laclau, Universalism, Particularism and the Question of Identity, in Ernesto Laclau, Emancipation(s) 20, 35 (2007).
194 Id.
195 See generally Koskenniemi, Gentle Civilizer, supra note 6.
196 Id. at 6, 10.
197 Id. at 2.
198 See Koskenniemi, Gentle Civilizer, supra note 6, 198–208 (on Jellinek), 238–49 (on Kelsen), 327–38 (on Scelle), 353–412 (on Lauterpacht).
199 Frederic Jameson, The Antinomies of Realism 111 (2013) (discussing “the dynastic tradition of history writing and historical narrative, which was essentially a story of the kings and queens and the achievements of the great, that is to say individuals, who are grasped in our own spirit of the word as the protagonists of historical actions and narratives”).
200 See Koskenniemi, Gentle Civilizer, supra note 6, at 9

If all the protagonists in this book are white men, for instance, that reflects my concern to retell the narrative of the mainstream as a story about its cosmopolitan sensibilities and political projects . . . .
Consistent with From Apology’s understanding of international law as a synchronic “language . . . a total system . . . complete at every moment, no matter what happens to have altered a moment ago,” we can read Gentle Civilizer’s various essays, on themes such as international legal practice in Germany in the period 1871-1933, as stories about past “kings”, past “gentle civilizers” retold in order to “sharpen [the] . . . ability [of present day princes] to act in the professional contexts that are open to [them] as [they] engage in [or “suture” themselves into their] practices and projects.”

The book’s “move from structure to history” is synchronic; it is dictated by From Apology’s structuralist understanding of international law “as a language.” If, as Jameson maintains, Saussurean, structuralist linguistics is synchronic rather than diachronic, then any account of international law’s history, built out of an understanding of international law “as a [synchronic] language,” will synchronize “individual events [in]to various manifestations of some basic idea . . . so that what at first seemed a series of events in time at length turns out to be a single timeless concept in the process of self-articulation.”

Gentle Civilizer’s “single timeless concept” emerges out of the story of a May 1966 debate

---

This should not, however, be read so as to exclude the possibility—indeed, the likelihood—that in the margins . . . there have been women and non-Europeans whose stories would desperately require telling so as to provide a more complete image of the profession’s political heritage.

201 JAMESON, PRISON-HOUSE, supra note 1, at 5–6

202 Koskenniemi, GENTLE CIVILIZER, supra note 6, at 10. See also Matt Craven, Theorising the Turn to History in International Law, in THE OXFORD HANDBOOK OF THE THEORY OF INTERNATIONAL LAW 21, 34 (Anne Orford & Florian Hoffmann eds., 2016), rejecting diachrony as method:

[International law is not simply something that one can examine through the lens of history as if it were some historical artefact existing independently of the means chosen by which it is to be represented, but a field of practice whose meaning and significance is constantly organized around, and through the medium of, a discourse that links present to past.

203 Koskenniemi, GENTLE CIVILIZER, supra note 6, at 6.

204 Koskenniemi, FROM APOLOGY, supra note 4, at 568.

205 Id.

206 JAMESON, PRISON-HOUSE, supra note 1, at 70.
between Professors A.J. Thomas, Adolf Berle and Wolfgang Friedmann. In Koskenniemi’s hands the story is an allegory. Themes and tensions that permeate international law’s history play out in interactions between its characters, and Koskenniemi extracts a moral from it, using that moral to synchronize the individual essays into a coherent book.

The debate concerned the legality of US military intervention in the Dominican Republic. For Thomas “[t]he purpose of the rule against intervention [in a foreign state] was to protect ‘the liberty and self-determination of a people,’” values that could not be protected “[o]nce the communists control a government.” It followed that US military intervention was lawful, in particular because communist “infiltration” of the internal uprising amounted to an “armed attack.” Berle argued in favor of US military intervention despite 207 See Koskenniemi, Gentle Civilizer, supra note 6, at 497–501.

208 See Fredric Jameson, The Antinomies, supra note 199. His observations on Alfred Döblin’s method, in his novel Wallenstein, seem equally applicable to Koskenniemi’s method, with money as Döblin’s moral and formalism as Koskenniemni’s:

[F]illed at every moment with names, with all the characters of history, some known, some only mentioned in passing; and with place names as well, not even the map is enough to accommodate them all. It is a pulsing interminable uninterrupted flow, true textuality (not mere form without content) in which everything is in perpetual change back and forth across Central Europe yet driving forward temporally so that time itself, the passing instants, become invisible, only the events are generated and they never stop, the writer never stops (he thereby disappears also), and the sources are so thoroughly used up that nothing is any more allusion . . . there can be no longer any competition with this unending flow of text but only the affect the pulses through it and changes color from pallor to flush . . . all the tonalities of the affective spectrum stream through the interminable moments, none of them truly fulfilled or effectuating any lasting pause or destiny . . . . Not the least interest of this novel is indeed the recurrence in the form of an allegorical habit . . . Everything here . . . has to do with money, and with an immense coral polyp that refuses to starve or die away but keeps itself in life for unforeseeable years by the very strength with which it draws money out of its hiding place . . . Wealth then becomes the very conduit of energy itself.

Id., at 244–45.

210 Id.
the lack of UN Security Council authorization or a credible self-defence argument, but Friedmann insisted that:

“[T]here are norms of international law. If we wish to ignore them, then let us say frankly that international law is of no concern to us. But don’t let us pretend that we argue in terms of international law, when in fact we argue in terms of power or of ideology.”

Koskenniemi maintains that Friedmann was “well aware of the shades of grey in all legal argumentation,” well aware, recalling the discussion of Hegemony and Socialist Strategy above, of the contingent, articulatory nature of legal practice. Analyzing Friedmann’s position, Koskenniemi emphasizes that “differential [legal] positions” can be “articulated within,” but not outwith, “[the] discourse”:

Perhaps what Friedmann finds objectionable is the nonchalance with which Thomas and Berle treat his profession, the (to him) self-evident hypocrisy that accompanied their reasoning and that seemed to fatally undermine the profession’s faith and integrity. Indeed, it may have seemed to him that what Thomas and Berle were doing was not part of legal discourse at all.

Thomas and Berle break “the chain” that binds the subject to “its discourse,” and that break is the source of the objection Koskenniemi expresses allegorically through Friedmann. Friedmann is a “stand-in,” an ideal-typical international lawyer qua sutured

---

211 See id. at 497–98.

212 Id. at 499 (quoting A.J. Thomas, Ann Van WYnEN Thomas & John Carey, The Dominican Republic Crisis 113 (1966)).

213 Id.

216 Miller, supra note 128, at 93.

217 Koskenniemi’s objection, via Friedmann, to Thomas and Berle seems to echo Freud in the sense captured by Caudill, see supra note 14, at 661 (“Freud believed that the primordial and dangerous passions of the individual must be controlled by inherently oppressive social structures.”); see also Anne Orford, A Journal of the Voyage subject, who “take[s] the place” of the subject, the “profession,” within international law’s structure/discourse.

The allegory of the May 1966 debate is the “nodal point,” the “point de capiton,” of Gentle Civilizer and of Koskenniemi’s work as a whole. A collection of “privileged signifiers”—the arguments advanced by Thomas, Berle, and Friedmann—“collectively” fix the meaning of the signifying chain that runs through From Apology and Gentle Civilizer, “partially fixing” the meaning of international legal practice in the process. For Koskenniemi, and under the banner of the “culture of formalism... the story of international law from Rolin to Friedmann”—from the foundation of the Institut de Droit International in 1873 by Gustave Rolin-Jaquemyns and the other “men of 1873” to Friedmann’s 1966 rejection of Thomas’ and Berle’s political pragmatism—“does have coherence.” It is the story of an attempt to serve, in the passé language of 1873, as “the legal conscience... of the civilized world”; of attempts to sustain “a practice that builds on formal arguments that are available to all under conditions of equality... insisting that absent the possibility of building social life on unmediated love or universal reason, persuading people to bracket their own sensibilities and learn openness for others, is not worthless.”

“What at first seemed a series of events in time”—Gentle Civilizer’s apparently disparate historical essays—“turns out to be a single timeless concept in the process of self-from Apology to Utopia (2006) 7 GERMAN L.J. 993, 995 (2006) (“I was struck... by the ease with which Koskenniemi accepts, even embraces, the constraints of institutional life.”).

---

218 Miller, supra note 128, at 93.

219 See supra Section C. I., “Hegemony” (on “nodal point”/“point de capiton”).

220 LACLAU AND MOUffe, HEGEMONY, supra note 155, at 112.

221 Id. at 113.

222 KOSKENNIEI, GENTLE CIVILIZER, supra note 6, at 502 (discussing the “culture of formalism”); id. at 39–41 (discussing the Institut’s foundation in 1873). See Andrew Lang & Susan Marks, People with Projects: Writing the Lives of International Lawyers, 27 TEMPLE INT’L & COMP. L.J. 437, 446 (2016) (“Martti sees the founders of the Institut de droit International and their twentieth century successors as exemplifying and enacting in their professional lives some version of the kind of responsible moral agency which he seeks to enliven in the practice of international lawyers today.”).

224 KOSKENNIEI, GENTLE CIVILIZER, supra note 6, at 501, 502. See also Koskenniemi, Between Commitment and Cynicism, supra note 90, at 498 (“To struggle for ‘world peace through law’, ‘world order models’, the rights of future generations, ‘fairness’ or indeed global governance is far from a recipe for diplomatic success. But we would not recognize the profession for what it is if it did not hark back to such objectives.”).
articulation.”

If the “culture of formalism” looked as though it had been articulated by Koskenniemi, if it looked like an “intellectual construction” produced out of “comparisons between one moment of lived time and another by someone who stands outside” international law, it would appear diachronic and lose the quality of seeming internal to international law’s discourse. By apparently emerging out of “a series of events in time” at the end of Gentle Civilizer, the “culture of formalism” seems to articulate itself. Crucially, however, behind this “self-articulation” lurks Koskenniemi’s a priori preference, expressed (covertly) in From Apology, for the synchronic over the diachronic. “[T]he decision as to whether one faces a break or a continuity,” the choice between synchrony and diachrony, between “whether the present is to be seen as a historical originality or as the simply prolongation of more of the same under different sheep’s clothing,” is pure rather than “empirically justifiable or philosophically arguable . . . since it is itself the inaugural narrative act that grounds the perception and interpretation of the events to be narrated.” If the choice between synchrony and diachrony is not “justifiable” then, methodologically, the best course of action is to use the fabric of the text to cover over the fact that you have chosen one over the other. To do this the text must be structured so as to make your choice seem natural and uncontroversial. This explains why the “culture of formalism” appears to articulate itself and why, despite being Koskenniemi’s core message, he only introduces it at the end of his second book.

Gentle Civilizer does not, then, “move from structure to history,” insofar as that implies an opposition between structure and history. Rather, the book is a structuralist-synchronic history of international law, and it needs to be read as such. I will return to the possibility of choosing diachrony over synchrony as the foundation of an alternative theory of international law and its practice in the final part of this Article. For now, I simply want to emphasize the fact a choice between synchrony and diachrony exists.

---

225 Jameson, Prison-House, supra note 1, at 170 (emphasis added).
226 Id. at 6.
227 Jameson, Postmodernism, supra note 17, at xii–xiii.
228 Id. at xii.
229 Id. at xii.
230 Koskenniemi, Gentle Civilizer, supra note 6, at 6.
231 Compare George Galindo’s review of Gentle Civilizer and his conclusion that it “represents a historiographical turn in the work of Koskenniemi and paves the way for the same in the field of international law.” See George Galindo, Martti Koskenniemi and the Historiographical Turn in International Law, 16 EUR. J. INT’L L. 539, 542 (2005).
III. “Empty” Universalism

The “culture of formalism” is an argument for an “‘empty’ . . . negative” universalism that “avoids the danger of imperialism” by being “recognizable . . . only in terms of its opposition to something that it is not.”232 While “Thomas and Berle saw politics as a clash of incompatible particularities—‘identity politics’ . . . Friedmann kept open the space for something beyond the merely particular,”233 for an “empty” universalism.

Koskenniemi derives his non-imperialist, “empty,” formal universalism from Laclau,234 and it recurs throughout his work.235 For Laclau hegemony is a political practice in pursuit of an unrealizable universal. The process of Italian unification that began in the nineteenth century, for example, is not so much a “concrete political programme” as “the name or . . . symbol of a lack,” 236 and the process is capable of sustaining Italian politics “over a period of centuries” because it is built around that “constitutive lack” 237

232 Koskenniemi, Gentle Civilizer, supra note 6, at 504, 507.

233 Id. at 501.

234 Id. at 505–508 n.307–11. Justin Desautels-Stein, Chiastic law, supra note 29, reads Koskenniemi’s “culture of formalism” through Soren Kierkegaard’s figure of the ‘Knight of Faith,’ emphasizing the extent to which Koskenniemi’s formalism involves “having faith in a universal that is at once impossible and realisable.” Id. at 288. The Laclauian-Lacanian reading offered here has, I claim, “priority”—on “priority” see supra Section A, “Introduction”—over Desautels-Stein’s reading.

235 See, e.g., Koskenniemi, Constitutionalism as Mindset, supra note 191, at 31 (arguing that the international lawyer qua “moral politician” is “the actor conscious that the right judgment cannot be reduced to the use of instrumental reason and who, in judging, aims to act as a ‘genuine republican’”); Martti Koskenniemi, The Lady Doth Protest Too Much: Kosovo, and the Turn to Ethics in International Law, 65 Mod. L. Rev. 159, 174 (2002) (“[F]ormalism constitutes a horizon of universality, embedded in a culture of restraint, a commitment to listening to others’ claims and seeking to take them into account” – emphasis in original); Martti Koskenniemi, The Fate of Public International Law: Between Technique and Politics, 70 Mod. L. Rev. 1, 30 (2007):

[T]he tradition of international law has often acted as a carrier of what is perhaps best described as the regulative idea of universal community, independent of particular interests or desires. This is Kant’s cosmopolitan project rightly understood: not an end-state or party programme but a project of critical reason that measures today’s state of affairs from the perspective of an ideal of universality that cannot be reformulated into an institution, a technique of rule, without destroying it.

See also Martti Koskenniemi, International Law in Europe, supra note 181, at 120, 122–23.

236 Ernesto Laclau, Subject of Politics, Politics of the Subject, in Ernesto Laclau, Emancipation(s) 47, 63 (2007).

237 Id.
Hegemonic practices are attempts to resolve “the openness of the social,” “to fill in” or “suture” fractures in the social fabric.238 Because “a closure of the social is . . . impossible”239—efforts to articulate ways in which society might be changed without any real prospect that this will achieve a “totally sutured society . . . where this filling-in would have reached its ultimate consequences.”240 Koskenniemi uses formalism as a euphemism for hegemony. He presents his argument for international legal practice as hegemony in the abstract,241 in the footnotes.242 The term “formalism” seems somehow more consonant with international legal discourse than

238 LA CLAU AND MOUFFE, HEGEMONY, supra note 155, at 88 n.1

239 Id.

240 Id. See also Ernesto Laclau, Structure, History and the Political, in JUDITH BUTLER, ERNESTO LA CLAU & SLAVOŽ ŽIŽEK, CONTINGENCY, HEGEMONY, UNIVERSALITY: CONTEMPORARY DIALOGUES ON THE LEFT 182, 199 (2000) (“[I]nstead of . . . impossibility leading to a series of substitutions which attempt to supersede it, it leads to a symbolization of impossibility as such as a positive value.”).

241 Martti Koskenniemi, What Should International Lawyers Learn from Karl Marx?, 17 LEIDEN J. INT’L L. 229 (2004). Koskenniemi notes, in the article’s abstract, that “[t]he task . . . is to move from doctrinal critique to progressive practice” and that “the theory of hegemony provides the best available account of how that can be undertaken without losing the ambition of the law’s universality.” Id. at 229. Koskenniemi does not, however, directly advocate the practice of international law as hegemony in the article’s main text. See also Martti Koskenniemi, Law’s Negative Aesthetic: Will it Save Us?, 41 PHILOS. & SOC. CRITICISM 1039 (2015) (summarizing the argument for the practice of international law as hegemony without presenting it as an argument for hegemonic practice); Martti Koskenniemi, What is Critical Research in International Law? Celebrating Structuralism, 29 LEIDEN J. INT’L L. 727, 734 (2016), arguing, in abstract terms, for an understanding of research in international law as an exercise in hegemonic intervention:

Structural research of the kind displayed in [From Apology] tries to keep alive the political intuitions of the researcher by demonstrating that there really is no safe ground of ‘mere professionalism’ where attitudes of blasé neutrality would be appropriate. On the other hand, by making express the rules that provide for legal competence, such research seeks to empower the critical researcher to operate in actually existing institutions in potentially influential ways, aware of the structural constraints but also of the malleability, gaps and loopholes of their official rhetoric.

242 Koskenniemi, The Lady Doth Protest, supra note 235, at 174 n.51 (referring to and linking LA CLAU & MOUFFE, HEGEMONY, supra note 155, and JUDITH BUTLER, ERNESTO LA CLAU & SLAVOŽ ŽIŽEK, CONTINGENCY, HEGEMONY, UNIVERSALITY: CONTEMPORARY DIALOGUES ON THE LEFT (2000), with his discussion of the “culture of formalism” in KOSKENNIEMI, GENTLE CIVILIZER, supra note 6).
“hegemony,” more consistent with the suture between the international lawyer and his discourse.243

The hegemonic practice of international law within international legal discourse sustains the “authentic[ity]” and “integrity” of international law,244 creating “a continuity operating through partial discontinuities” that counterbalances “the openness of the social” by keeping the fractures,245 the “fissure[s],”246 within manageable bounds. For Koskenniemi international law’s value, as a hegemonic practice, does not lie in any particular achievement or track-record of success but in its status as an open, “empty” space of articulation in which “the common good of humankind [is] not reducible to the good of any particular institution . . . ‘regime’ [or particularity]”.247

[International law’s formalism . . . brings political antagonists together as they invoke contrasting understandings of its rules and institutions. In the absence of agreement over, of knowledge of, the “true” objectives of political community—that is to say, in an agnostic world—the pure form of international law provides the shared surface—the only such surface—on which political adversaries recognize each other as such and pursue their adversity in terms of something shared, instead of seeking to gain full exclusion—“outlawry”—of the other. In this sense, international law’s value and its misery lie in its being the fragile surface of political community among social agents . . . who disagree about their preferences but do this within a structure that invites them to argue in terms of an assumed universality.248

243 On “suture” see supra Section B. V., “Structure/Subject/Suture.”

244 Koskenniemi, FROM APOLOGY, supra note 4, at 546 (advocating “authentic commitment” to international law); id. at 555 (on “integrity”).

245 Laclau, Identity and Hegemony, supra note 124, at 78; Laclau and Mouffe, Hegemony, supra note 155, at 88 n.1.

246 Laclau and Mouffe, Hegemony, supra note 155, at 8.

248 Koskenniemi, What is International Law For?, supra note 180, at 48.
So conceived, “law becomes a partial cure for the traumas of society, in a fashion not dissimilar to that applied to individuals in therapy.”249 If psychoanalysis is a talking therapy then international law, for Koskenniemi, is a “speaking” therapy,250 a way of articulating some-things after we (international lawyers) have realized that we cannot articulate everything, that we have been (metaphorically) castrated.251

IV. Necessity/Impossibility/“Three Endeavours”

Building on the discussion thus far, this Section considers the place of what Laclau describes as “the double condition of necessity and impossibility” in Koskenniemi’s work.252

Laclau explores the formal “necessity” of pursuing the concretely “impossible” through hegemony by outlining “three endeavours,” each central to the construction of “hegemonic articulatory logics.”253 My aim in this Section is to show that Koskenniemi engages in each of these endeavours in pursuit of an “intellectual strategy” that is designed to establish, first, that international law is a Laclauian discourse and, second, that the making of international legal arguments involves, and throughout its history has involved, “articulatory practice” by sutured subjects.

249 DOUZINAS, supra note 14, at 305.

250 See KOSKENNIEMI, FROM APOLOGY, at 567–68 (“The descriptive thesis in From Apology to Utopia . . . seeks to articulate the competence of native language-speakers of international law . . . . Native language speakers of, say, Finnish, are also able to support contrasting political agendas without the question of the genuineness of their linguistic competence ever arising.” (citations omitted)). See also DOUZINAS, supra note 14, at 308–09:

Speaking leads to a truce, rivalry is abandoned in order to participate in discourse and share our imaginary scenarios or symbolic representations with the other. But speech is a lie, a denying negating, deferring discourse which places the love-object, death and its desire, (temporarily) in abeyance. But this lie is also the whole truth.

251 KOSKENNIEMI, FROM APOLOGY, supra note 19, at 13 (“By providing an ‘insider’s view’ to legal discourse, such an approach might produce a therapeutic effect on lawyers frustrated with their inability to cope with the indeterminacy of theory and the irrelevance of doctrine.”).

252 Laclau, Identity and Hegemony, supra note 124, at 75.

253 Id.

254 Id.
The first “endeavour” involves “understand[ing] the logics by which each of the two dimensions [necessity and impossibility] subverts the other.” From Apology understands the “subvert[ing]” relationship between necessity and impossibility in international law through the political/“normativity” vs. sociological/“concreteness” opposition. While it may appear necessary for international law to find and occupy a space between these two domains, a “specifically ‘legal’ discourse,” finding and occupying that space is impossible. The impossibility of finding that space does not, however, make the search for it unnecessary. The search itself may be the product of the “myth” of a “specifically ‘legal’ discourse” but the fact that the search is mythical does not mean that international law can stop searching. While, therefore, “intellectual operations [which seek to distinguish international law from the sociological and the political] do not leave room for any specifically legal discourse,” the structure of international legal argument is defined by the “dynamics of [the] contradiction” between “normativity” and “concreteness.”

This leads into the second of Laclau’s “endeavours,” which involves “look[ing] at the political productivity of [the] mutual subversion [of necessity and impossibility]—that is, what it makes possible to understand about the working of our societies which goes beyond what is achievable by unilaterizing either of the two poles.” International law needs to be understood as a “grammar,” as a “discourse,” precisely because finding and occupying the space “between the sociological and the political” is a necessary impossibility and an impossible necessity. That the occupation of such a space is impossible does not mean that the idea of that space is not existentially necessary to international law qua discourse. Equally, the fact that the search for that space is necessary to the discourse of international law does not make it possible to actually find that space.

255 Id.
256 Koskenniemi, From Apology, supra note 4, at 1.
257 Id. at 16.
258 Id. at 58.
259 Laclau, Identity and Hegemony, supra note 124, at 75.
260 Koskenniemi, From Apology, supra note 4, at 11 (“[I]t [From Apology’s “deconstructive study of legal argument”—Id. at 10] seeks to make explicit the legal “grammar” which controls the production of particular arguments within discourse and which counts for the lawyers specific legal ‘competence.’”).
261 Laclau, Identity and Hegemony, supra note 124, at 76 (using “grammar” as a synonym for “discourse”).
262 Koskenniemi, From Apology, supra note 4, at 1.
263 Id.
It is in this sense that international law lives with its neurosis, with a search for a "specifically 'legal' discourse" that is as necessary as it is futile. International law "get[s] over" its neurosis, and lives within its myth, by recognizing the necessary impossibility and the impossible necessity of the search—a move, as discussed above, that From Apology argues for—but that does not abolish the myth or cure the neurosis.

The idea of a "specifically 'legal' discourse" is a mythical "constitutive lack" at the heart of international law, something that constitutes and structures the discourse by its absence. It designates a gap in the structure of the discourse which cannot be sutured by hegemonic, "articulatory practice," but which creates the space for that practice. Abolishing the myth of a "specifically 'legal' discourse" or ending the neurotic search for sociological and political validation would abolish the "constitutive lack" and, consequently, destroy international legal discourse qua discourse.

The "constitutive lack" of a place "between the sociological and the political" in From Apology translates into the "empty" universalism of Gentle Civilizer because hegemonic, "articulatory practice" within a discourse is incompatible with any concrete, universal program:

It is only as long as the ideal social order remains formal that it can accommodate autonomy and community and be acceptable. Immediately as it is given concrete content—as soon as it becomes a programme of what to do—it will appear to overrule somebody's preferred substantive view and seem illegitimate as such.

This is consistent which Laclau's Italian unification example, quoted above. Hegemonic "formalism projects the universal community as a standard—but always as an unachieved one," because:

264 Aristodemou, supra note 1, at 37.
265 See Laclau, Subject of Politics, supra note 236, at 63 (on "constitutive lack").
266 KOSKENNIEMI, FROM APOLOGY, supra note 4, at 484 (emphasis in original).
267 See supra note 237 and accompanying text.
268 KOSKENNIEMI, GENTLE CIVILIZER, supra note 6, at 508.
The fullness of society is an impossible object which successive contingent contents try to impersonate through catachrestical displacements. This is exactly what hegemony means. And it is also the source of whatever freedom can exist in society: no such freedom would be possible if the ‘fullness’ of society had reached its ‘true’ ontic form.

The third “endeavour” involves “trac[ing] the genealogy of this undecidable logic [between necessity and impossibility], the way it was already subverting the central texts of our political and philosophical tradition.” From Apology “trace[s] the genealogy of [the] undecidable logic” of necessity and impossibility, mapping the interaction between necessary, “ascending,” concrete, apologetic and impossible, “descending,” utopian arguments across the core “categories of classical” international legal thought, from “[s]overeignty” to “[s]ources” and “[c]ustom.” From Apology “[conceives] of [those “categories”]... as objects presupposed by hegemonic articulatory logics.” It does not “flat[ly] reject” them because of their “undecidable logic,” because they can be approached with equal validity from “ascending” and “descending” perspectives. It treats each category as an aspect of a discourse that is structured so as to demand articulatory, hegemonic decision-making by its practitioners.

Likewise, Gentle Civilizer “trace[s] the genealogy of [the] undecidable logic” of “the culture of formalism.” Perhaps Hersch Lauterpacht’s early to mid-twentieth century moderate, “modernist,” “utopian federalism” was, ultimately, just a bit too utopian, and perhaps it

---

269 Laclau, Identity and Hegemony, supra note 124, at 79.

270 Id. at 75.

271 Id.

272 Koskenniemi, From Apology, supra note 4, at 224, 303, 388.

273 Laclau, Identity and Hegemony, supra note 124, at 75 (emphasis in original).

274 Id.

275 Koskenniemi, Gentle Civilizer, supra note 6, at 357.
is no longer possible to “ha[ve] no doubt about the universal and intrinsically beneficent character of legal reason.”\textsuperscript{276} But, for Koskenniemi, that does not mean that Lauterpacht’s “Victorian tradition” of “political commitment” and a “consistent attempt to maintain, through projection, the wholeness of a social world and [a] personal identity” lacks contemporary relevance.\textsuperscript{277} And perhaps Hans Kelsen, by cutting law off from “its relationship to the surrounding world,”\textsuperscript{278} went too far in his attempts to establish a “pure theory” but, for Koskenniemi, that does not mean that his efforts can be ignored or dismissed: “Since Kelsen, lawyers have looked for professional identity in a middle ground between that which is sociological description (of what works) and that which is moral speculation (of what would be good).”\textsuperscript{279} Gentle Civilizer argues that international law is, and always has been, an “undecidable,” unsuturable logic—a Laclauian discourse—whose future depends, and always has depended, on subjects suturing themselves into the discourse and making political choices through hegemonic, “articulatory practice.”\textsuperscript{280} It makes that argument through a synchronic history of the discipline; a history that tells the discipline what it now is by explaining how it has always been this way.

The aim, in this Section, has been to demonstrate the Laclauian character of Koskenniemi’s argument. This moves us closer to the core argument of this Article—that Koskenniemi’s work can and should be read as a Lacanian psychoanalysis of international law(ers)—but, to demonstrate the ultimate dependence of Koskenniemi’s Laclau-inspired argument for the hegemony of the international lawyer on Lacanian psychoanalytic theory, the relationship between Laclau and Lacan needs to be addressed directly.

\textsuperscript{276} Id. at 412.

\textsuperscript{277} Id. at 376, 412. See also Koskenniemi, \textit{Between Commitment and Cynicism}, supra note 90, at 498:

The hopes of the reconstructive scholarship of the inter-war era as well as the projects for peaceful settlement and collective security within the League of Nations were easily dashed by Fascist aggression. Though tragedy is the name we apply to that period, we still admire the heroism of the profession’s leading names: Anzilotti, Kelsen, Lauterpacht, Scelle . . . their belief in public governance through international institutions and the pacifying effects of interdependence remain part of the professional ethos today.

\textsuperscript{278} KOSKENNIEMI, GENTLE CIVILIZER, supra note 6, at 249.

\textsuperscript{279} Id. at 494.

\textsuperscript{280} LACLAU & MOUFFE, HEGEMONY, supra note 155, at 105.
V. Laclau and Lacan . . . and Koskenniemi

Lacan’s political theory of hegemony is largely based on Laclau’s psychoanalytic theory.\footnote{281 See Laclau, Identity and Hegemony, supra note 124, at 71; STAVRAKAKIS, LACAN AND THE POLITICAL, supra note 118; Yannis STAVRAKAKIS, THE LACANIAN LEFT: PSYCHOANALYSIS, THEORY, POLITICS (2007).} Like Lacan, Laclau insists on the “primacy of the signifier.”\footnote{282 Hewitson, supra note 119.} Language and “articulation” are the focus of hegemonic politics because they are the means by which our social reality is formed: “The bar in the relation $S/s$ is the very precondition of a primacy of the signifier without which hegemonic displacements would be inconceivable.”\footnote{283 Laclau, Identity and Hegemony, supra note 124, at 68–69. Laclau, id., reproduces Lacan’s representation of the signifier/signified relationship in Lacan, The Instance of the Letter in the Unconscious, supra note 112, at 414, (with the ‘$S$’ above the ‘$s$’). The ‘$S$’ and ‘$s$’ are placed side by side in this quotation for typographical reasons only.}

Lacanian psychoanalysis and Laclauian “hegemonic analysis” are concerned with truth rather than meaning,\footnote{284 See id. at 69} while insisting on the unachievability of any fixed truth:

The ultimate point which makes an exchange between Lacanian theory and the hegemonic approach to politics possible and fruitful is that in both cases, any kind of unfixity, tropic displacement, and so on, is organized around an original lack which, while it imposes an extra duty on all processes of representation—they have to represent not just a determinate ontic content but equally the principle of representability as such—also, as this dual task cannot but ultimately fail in achieving the suture it attempts, opens the way to a series of indefinite substitutions which are the very ground of a radical historicism.\footnote{285 Id. at 71.}
The foundations of Laclau’s political theory of hegemony lie in Lacanian psychoanalysis. The truth of any subjectivity—the truth of who or how someone, like the Rat Man, is—is understood through the structure in which they were formed and into which they have been “sutured.” That structure exists in language, in the signification of the roles or qualities—wife/mother/sociology/concreteness/apology or father/politics/friend/lover/normativity/utopia—and the recounting of stories about a father’s gambling, a mother’s riches, or a May 1966 debate in New York.

The aim of Lacanian psychoanalysis and Laclauian hegemonic politics is not to reconstruct the present out of the past (diachrony) but to explain the possibilities of present action within pre-formed structures (synchrony). Psychoanalysis cannot “perfect” the Rat Man’s life, and we cannot uncastrate ourselves, but we can shed “light” on our situation and find progressive ways to act if we psychoanalyze our situation, our structural position. Hegemony, in this sense, is a psychoanalytic-structuralist theory of political praxis.

Koskenniemi’s message is that an understanding of the structures which condition and create the subjectivity of the international lawyer can secure the future of international legal practice, just as an appreciation of the reasons for his neurotic behavior—his elaborate scheme to repay the debt—makes it possible for the Rat Man to continue with his life. An accommodation with or understanding of your structure as your structure

---

286 See Lacan, Myth, supra note 47, at 425 (“more light”). See also Aristodemou, supra note 14, at 37 (“[Lacanian psychoanalysis] requires the annihilation of the fantasies and misrecognitions that the patient used to rely on, and the constitution of a new, perhaps less confident and arrogant, but also...a truer and more ethical subject.”); Jacques Lacan, Discourse Analysis and Ego Analysis, in THE SEMINAR OF JACQUES LACAN: BOOK I, FREUD’S PAPERS ON TECHNIQUE 1953–1954 62, 67 (Jacques-Alain Miller ed., John Forrester trans., 1988) (“Nothing other than this is at stake in analysis—recognising what function the subject takes on in the order of the symbolic relations which covers the entire field of human relations.”); Koskenniemi, Celebrating Structuralism, supra note 241, at 728:

One type of ‘structural’ analysis that arose in the twentieth century aimed to make explicit the rules of production of...‘there-ness’, the sense in which we end up feeling that something is so ‘true’ that we allow it to determine the way we live. According to this type of analysis, of which [From Apology] is a specimen, learning to know how such ‘truths’ are produced would release us of their power so as to take action in order to deal with problems that otherwise seemed intractable (because they were based on ‘truths’) and allows us to lead in some sense better lives.
guarantees continued life (within the structure), and, in this sense, the future of international law depends on synchronization with its past.287

VI. The Psychoanalysis of International Law

Summarizing the analysis and argument thus far, Koskenniemi’s work should be read as a psychoanalysis of international law/the international lawyer because, by applying Laclau’s Lacanian political theory of hegemony, described by Laclau and Mouffe in terms of the maintenance of a coherent, modernist political practice in the turbulence of the post-Cold War era,288 it keeps the “modernist . . . charismatic,”289 quasi-“heroic” international lawyer alive despite his/international law’s near-fatal contradictions, flaws and anxieties.290 It does this without curing his neurosis, and without resolving the fundamental contradictions in international law’s basic structure, just as psychoanalysis kept the Rat Man alive without “uncastrating” him/his father.291

For some international lawyers it may be enough that they are (professionally) alive.292 I disagree. Maybe I, qua international legal academic, have suicidal tendencies,293 a “death

287 See Martti Koskenniemi, Histories of International Law: Significance and Problems for a Critical View, 27 TEMPLE INT’L & COMP. L.J. 215, 216 (2013) (“What seems needed is a better understanding of how we have come to where we are now.”); see also id. at 238:

The turn to contextual readings of international law marks a welcome advance from the older search for origins and the progressive accounting of international doctrines that accompanied traditional histories . . . . Nevertheless, there was something valuable in the sweeping normativity of older histories, in the way they sought to produce “lessons” from their narratives. A careful reconstruction of the context cannot be all. Critical history must also examine how those contexts were formed and to what extent they have persisted to make the world into what it has become today.

On the importance of tradition and the passage of time in international law, see Nicholson, supra note 20.

288 See LACLAU & MOUFFE, HEGEMONY, supra note 155, at vii–xix.

289 JAMESON, PRISON-HOUSE, supra note 1, at 306.

290 Koskenniemi, Between Commitment and Cynicism, supra note 90, at 497 (“A commitment, distinguished from mere “work,” has an aspect of heroism in that it works against all odds.”).

291 See supra Section B. II., “Lacan and the Rat Man”.

292 See Caudill, supra note 14, at 661 (noting that a Freudian psychoanalytic perspective “may be helpful in social analysis . . . [but] invite[s] pessimism and provides the basis for an implied conservatism rather than for a radical or utopian critique of the status quo”).

293 See Jon Mills, Reflections on the Death Drive, 23 PSYCHOANALYTIC PSYCHOLOGY 373, 375 (2006):
instinct,” but my point, foreshadowed in the introduction and developed in the final part of this Article, is that it is time to euthanize the image of the modernist international lawyer qua quasi-hero that Koskenniemi has kept alive. Before developing this argument, however, one final, fundamental question about the relationship between Koskenniemi’s work and Lacan needs to be addressed.

VII. Reality Affects and the “Lack” of Lacan

That final and fundamental question is this: How is it possible to read Koskenniemi’s work as a Lacanian psychoanalysis of international law, as this Article has, given: (i) the lack of Lacan’s name in Koskenniemi’s texts, and; (ii) the absence of deliberate concealment by Koskenniemi of Lacan’s place in his work (which I am not suggesting)?

Lacan provides the answer to (i): “every discourse derives its effects from the unconscious.” Lacanian psychoanalysis is, in Jameson’s terms, the “political unconscious” of Koskenniemi’s work, its “hidden master narrative” and the “hidden narrative” of its “master” (Koskenniemi). It is because Lacan is an “unconscious” presence, a “constitutive lack”—someone present in Koskenniemi’s texts for all that the reader thinks he is not there—that Koskenniemi’s work has been so “effective.”

A logical claim can be advanced that life is only possible through the force of the negative that brings about higher developmental achievements through the destruction of the old . . . . Psychoanalysts are often confused by viewing death as merely a physical end-state or the termination of life, when it may be memorialized in the psyche as a primary ontological principle that informs the trajectory of all psychic activity.

(citation omitted).

[B]esides the instinct to preserve living substance and to join it into ever larger units, there must exist another, contrary instinct seeking to dissolve those units and to bring them back to the primaeval, inorganic state. That is to say, as well as Eros there was an instinct of death.

296 JAMESON, POLITICAL UNCONSCIOUS, supra note 24, at 13.
To tell international law/international lawyers that it/they are being psychoanalyzed—to reveal that in the text, rather than concealing it in the subtext—would make the whole exercise ineffectual.\footnote{See id. at 68.} It/they may not, after all, consent to the analysis and, even if it/they did, they may not want to read the analyst’s report. Without telling it/him what he is doing, the analyst/master “initiates the one still in ignorance into the dimension of fundamental . . . relationships” through psychoanalysis by “open[ing] . . . what one might call the way to moral consciousness.”\footnote{Lacan, Myth, supra note 47, at 407–08.} He shows the analysand/patient the structure within which he exists through a process of “self-articulation,”\footnote{On “self-articulation,” see Section C. II., “Structuralism, synchrony and the ‘move to history’”.} in which the analysand/patient self-articulates their structure as \emph{their} structure,\footnote{See Section B. II., “Lacan and the Rat Man”.
} suturing themselves into it in the process.\footnote{The necessity of “self-articulation” and self-suturing—of showing the international lawyer his structure rather than telling him about it—explains why Koskenniemi does not adopt Jason Beckett’s position and insist on formalism as “the only competent way in which [international law] may be spoken or practiced” (emphasis in original). Beckett, supra note 9, at 1079. See also Section II E., “Structure/Subject/Suture,” above.} Koskenniemi’s process of “showing” rather than “telling” produces a reality “affect”;\footnote{JAMESON, \textsc{The Antinomies of Realism}, supra note 199, at 21–26 (on “showing” and “telling”); \textit{id.} at 36, 70 (on “affect”).} it affect-ively makes the image of international law and the (sutured) identity of the international lawyer it produces and advocates—commitment to hegemonic practice within a linguistic structure, the “culture of formalism”—seem (really) real, seem more than the (mere) image or “fiction” it (really) is.\footnote{According to Jameson: “[W]e must think our way back into a situation in which the question of fiction/non-fiction] makes no sense and in which . . . the distinction between fiction and nonfiction (or history) does not yet obtain . . . postmodernity as such has now rendered those distinctions obsolete.” JAMESON, \textsc{The Antinomies of Realism}, supra note 199, at 253. Jameson also observes: \begin{quote} In the postmodern, where the original no longer exists and everything is an image, there can no longer be any question either of the accuracy or truth of representation . . . where the true is ontologically absent, there can be nothing false or fictive either: such concepts no longer apply to a world of simulacra, where only the names—Lacan’s “points de capiton” . . . remain. Id. at 293. See also Lacan, \textit{Subversion}, supra note 63, at 684 (“Thus Truth draws its guarantee from somewhere other than the Reality it concerns: it draws it from Speech. Just as it is from Speech that Truth receives the mark that instates it in a fictional structure.”); Jacques Lacan, \textit{Psychoanalysis and Its}}
Jameson considers the production of reality “affect” as a technique or style in literary realism associated, in particular—and not without relevance for international law given the foundation of the Institut de Droit International in 1873 and the significance that Koskenniemi attaches to that event in Gentle Civilizer—with “nineteenth-century realism.”

For Jameson “the realm of affect” involves “the ‘insurrection of the present against other temporalities.’” The synchronic manifests this “insurrection” in its prioritization of the present, of “the immediate lived experience of the native speaker,” over the diachronic’s emphasis on “comparisons between one moment of lived time and another.” Koskenniemi’s synchronic methodology, analyzed throughout this Article, can therefore be seen to exist within “the realm of affect.”

“Affect” itself is “resistan[t] . . . to language,” “a fleeting essence.” Affects are “nameless and unclassifiable”; anything that “means something” is not an affect. Affects are not “emotions” because “emotion is preeminently a phenomenon sorted out into an array of names” and names have “reifying effects” that turn sensations into named things. Affects are “characterized . . . in terms of physical sensation or sensory perception.” An affect is a “representational presence,” something which cannot be told or defined, something that is made real through representation and being shown.

Teaching, in JACQUES LACAN, ÉCRITS 364, 376 (Bruce Fink trans., 2006) (regarding “facticity” and the notion that “the truth brings out its fictional structure”).

305 JAMESON, THE ANTINOMIES OF REALISM, supra note 199, at 35.

306 Id. at 10 (quoting and translating the title of ALEXANDER KLUGE, DER ANGRIFF DER GEGENWART GEGEN DIE ÜBRIGE ZEIT (1985)).

307 See Section B. III, “International law ‘as a language’”.

309 Id. at 33.

310 Id.

311 Id. at 30.

312 Id. at 35.

313 Id. at 35.
affect becomes the organ of perception of the world itself, the vehicle of my being-in-the-world,” an image of international law as “pure form.”

Koskenniemi’s work, from From Apology through Gentle Civilizer and beyond, is an exercise in producing a reality “affect.” That affect cannot be defined or captured in concepts or names, but we come close to a direct encounter with it in the notion of the “culture of formalism.” Because it shows the reader the “culture of formalism” in practice, the allegorical story of the May 1966 debate between Thomas, Berle, and Friedmann is, in my view, the “nodal point,” the “point de capiton” of Koskenniemi’s work, the single most important story or “element” in Koskenniemi’s work.

An affective methodology is closely related to the Lacanian concept of “the real, or what is perceived as such, [as] . . . [that which] resists symbolisation absolutely.” The nature of “affect,” and of the Lacanian “real,” is such that you cannot (effectively) tell international lawyers who or what they real-ly, unconsciously are—you cannot symbolize or name them—but you can (affectively) show them.

That, in my view, is what Koskenniemi has done. His work shows that the reality of international law is an “affect” of its form but, precisely because it is an “affect,” you

514 Id. at 43.
516 Koskenniemi makes a point about reality affects in relation to Philip Allott’s work:

[The] style simultaneously affirms and erases the authorial voice . . . . A few lines of this text and every international lawyer will know who has written them. Erasure: but it is a voice that denies its own personality and seeks to rise above anything as superficial or flimsy as authorial. Where Roland Barthes famously analysed the effet de réel in literature, the power of the literary style—the style of ‘realism’—to create the impression that reality itself spoke, Philip uses an effet d’histoire—an effect as if history itself were speaking in his writing.

517 On which see Section C. II., “Structuralism, synchrony and the ‘move to history’”.
519 Lacan, Discourse analysis and ego analysis, supra note 286, at 66. See also Macey, supra note 73, at xxvi (“[T]he real . . . is not synonymous with external reality, but refers to the residual dimension that constantly resists symbolism and signification.”).
cannot formally tell anyone that. His inquiry into “the real” of international law, into its “deep-structure,” works on the basis of the production of reality “affects.” It has to show rather than tell because, as noted above, the real “resists symbolisation absolutely.” The reality “affect” that it produces is a “pure form,” a “vehicle of . . . being-in-the-world,” qua international legal form(alism).

International lawyers who refuse to accept Koskenniemi’s analysis, who remain immune to its reality “affect,” are, apparently, mistaken. They do not understand themselves: “les non-dupes errant” / “those who are not taken in err”. Because they “are not taken in,” not “affected,” not “committed” to (formal) international law above all else, Thomas’ and Berle’s contributions to the May 1966 debate are mistaken. Similarly, “activists” who prioritize the pursuit of political causes through legal argument over their commitment to international law itself are, apparently, not real lawyers.

The “political” (Jameson’s term) “effect” (Lacan’s term) of Koskenniemi’s psychoanalysis “derives” (Lacan’s term) from its production of a reality “affect” (Jameson’s term), from the fact that it is done “unconsciously” (both Lacan and Jameson focus on the 320 See Haskell, supra note 29, at 667, noting: [T]he irony . . . that while unquestionably a profoundly important text that bring to light central historical, methodological and theoretical problems confronting the discipline, it often does so inadvertently—in other words, it is exactly how these problems are circumvented, obscured, silenced in the text that brings them into focus.

---

321 Koskenniemi, FROM APOLOGY, supra note 4, at 6.

322 Koskenniemi, What is International Law For?, supra note 180, at 48.

323 JAMESON, THE ANTIMIMES OF REALISM, supra note 199, at 43.

324 See supra notes 2–3 and accompanying text.

325 See Section C. II., “Structuralism, Synchrony, and the ‘move to history’.”

327 JAMESON, POLITICAL UNCONSCIOUS, supra note 24; Lacan, Subversion, supra note 63, at 701; JAMESON, THE ANTIMIMES OF REALISM, supra note 199, at 36, 70 (on “affect”).
“unconscious”), and via “show” rather than “tell.” If “there is nothing that is not social and historical” and if “everything is ‘in the last analysis’ political” then Koskenniemi’s attempt to synchronize the history and present of international law, in a project designed to affectively delimit international law’s form, is “political.” It achieves political “effect”—it influences the polity’s self-consciousness—by producing a reality “affect.” Ultimately, “the power of [Koskenniemi’s] text[s], with [their] hidden assumptions, lies in a suppression of [their] mode of production not unlike the ego’s repression of its own self-constructive processes.”

Characterizing the master’s/analyst’s process as a “political” move in which the patient/analysand is shown the benefits of psychoanalysis without consenting to it may seem to contradict my claim (in (ii), at the start of this Section) that Koskenniemi has not deliberately concealed Lacan’s influence in his work. To overcome this apparent contradiction, we need to consider the links between Koskenniemi’s, David Kennedy’s and Duncan Kennedy’s work.

1. “Theses,” “Commentaries,” and Apologies

In his 1980 “Theses about International Law Discourse” David Kennedy outlined an “analytic approach” to international law, a “style that could be labelled structuralist because it seeks to explain the current pattern of discourse and commentary and the interconnectedness of both doctrinal areas and conceptual schools by reference to their underlying structures.” Kennedy notes that this “style” is based in part on Saussure’s 1966 Course in General Linguistics and Levi-Strauss’s 1966 The Savage Mind, two works that Koskenniemi references when explaining that From Apology takes a similarly “analytic approach,” “argu[ing] . . . ‘backwards’ from explicit arguments to their ‘deep-structure.’” Neither Kennedy nor Koskenniemi subjects these major works to analysis, simply referring to them in footnotes.

---

328 Jameson, Political Unconscious, supra note 24, at 5.
329 Caudill, supra note 14, at 673.
331 Id. at 355 n.4.
332 Id. at 355.
333 Koskenniemi, From Apology, supra note 4, at 6.
334 See David Kennedy, Theses, supra note 330, at 355; Koskenniemi, From Apology, supra note 4, at 6, 8.
For Kennedy “international legal scholarship is in crisis” because “as the practice of international law has expanded, it seems to have become weaker.”\footnote{Id. at 356.} This “crisis” and weakness are caused by “a conflict between the autonomy and cooperation of states,”\footnote{Id. at 362.} reflecting what David Kennedy and Duncan Kennedy label “[t]he fundamental contradiction” between individual freedom and collective, social life.\footnote{David Kennedy, Theses, supra note 330, at 361; Duncan Kennedy, The Structure of Blackstone’s Commentaries, 28 Buf. L. Rev. 205, 213 (1979).} David Kennedy uses the term as a shorthand for the “basic quandary” in which the interests of “individual nations” and “other sovereigns” conflict,\footnote{Id., at n.9; Duncan Kennedy, Blackstone’s Commentaries, supra note 337.} acknowledging the origin of the concept in Duncan Kennedy’s 1979 article “The Structure of Blackstone’s Commentaries,”\footnote{Duncan Kennedy, Blackstone’s Commentaries, supra note 337, at 213.} while Duncan Kennedy uses it as shorthand for the fact “that relations with others are both necessary to and incompatible with our freedom.”\footnote{Id. at 209.} “Blackstone’s Commentaries” outlines “a method for understanding the political significance of legal thinking, a method that might be called structuralist or phenomenological, or neo-Marxist, or all three together,”\footnote{Id. at 210.} setting up a tension between ideas of law as “an instrument of apology” and “a utopian enterprise.”\footnote{Id. ("[A]n instrument of apology—an attempt to mystify both dominators and dominated by convincing them of the ‘naturalness’, the ‘freedom’ and the ‘rationality’ of a condition of bondage.").} Legal analysis is, so the argument goes, inspired by a “utopian” motive which tries “to discover the conditions of social justice” yet simultaneously driven by an apologism that seeks to explain why things are, and will remain, the way they are.\footnote{Id. at 209.} The “contradiction” is also

\footnote{David Kennedy, Theses, supra note 330, at 364.}
“transformational” in the sense that “positions . . . are connected in a particular way” with “[e]ach pole of the binary opposition seem[ing] to contain its opposite in some sense.”

This “binary,” “transformational” analysis is echoed in Koskenniemi’s apology/utopia analytic, something he acknowledges in a footnote: “I have received the theme apology/utopia from [David Kennedy’s “Theses”] . . . article.” In another footnote he highlights the importance of “Blackstone’s Commentaries” as “the most influential” work on “[t]he strategy of ‘revealing’ contradictions within legal argument and tracing them back to more fundamental distortions in our ways to conceptualize human nature and social life,” without specifically highlighting the (apparent) origin of From Apology’s title in Duncan Kennedy’s article.

While the connection between Koskenniemi’s, David Kennedy’s and Duncan Kennedy’s work is well charted in the literature, the significance of that connection has not, to date, been fully articulated. Forensic analysis of the connections between the key texts—“Theses,” “Blackstone’s Commentaries,” From Apology, and related works by their authors—is required to remedy this.

That analysis starts with recognition that From Apology is not only connected to David Kennedy’s ‘Theses’; it picks Kennedy’s project up where he left off, continuing it and adopting his methodology. In From Apology’s introduction Koskenniemi outlines a “deconstructive” methodology based on Saussure’s work which he then develops into an account of international law as a “discourse.” This reflects David Kennedy’s argument, supported with reference to Levi-Strauss and Saussure, that “concentration upon discourse and upon the hidden ideologies, attitudes and structures which lie behind discourse, rather than upon the subject matter of legal talk” is required.

546 Id. 364–65.
547 Koskenniemi, From Apology, supra note 4, at 10 n.7. See also id. at 107 n.140.
548 Id. at 62 n.151. See also text accompanying supra note 342.
549 See, e.g., Lea Brilmayer, From Apology to Utopia: The Structure of International Legal Argument, 85 Am. Pol. Sci. Rev. 687 (1991); David Kennedy, The Last Treatise, supra note 5, at 982–83; Christoph Möllers, It’s About Legal Practice, Stupid, 7 German L.J. 1011, 1013 (2006); Rasulov, supra note 13, at 649–51.
550 Koskenniemi, From Apology, supra note 4, at 1–15 (note, in particular, 7 and 13).
551 David Kennedy, Theses, supra note 330, at 355 n.4.
552 Id. at 355.
Kennedy maintains that “good arguments do not resolve the questions posed by legal cases”; Koskenniemi “[t]hat there is no real discourse going on within legal argument . . . but only a patterned exchange of argument.” For Kennedy “[o]ne may imagine law to be either critical of or grounded in state behaviour, and neither understanding of law is sufficient”; for Koskenniemi, “international legal discourse cannot fully accept either of the justificatory patterns [‘ascending’ or ‘descending,’ “concrete” or “normative’] and it therefore produces “an incoherent argument which constantly shifts between the opposing positions whilst remaining open to challenge from the opposite argument.”

For Kennedy “practitioners . . . must act as though their discourse should be convincing without actually believing that they would be convinced were they to hear themselves”; for Koskenniemi, international lawyers have to maintain a “commitment” to international law despite very real and credible reasons which might lead them to lapse into “cynicism.”

Kennedy calls for “an alternative style of discourse aimed at revealing and resolving the dilemmas of social life, rather than hiding them or factoring them out of the discourse of law”; Koskenniemi produces a theory of international legal practice as hegemony which tackles the dilemmas of social life through “empty” universalism. Kennedy notes that, in “Theses,” he “confine[s] [him]self to a theoretical description of the patterns which seem responsible for indeterminacy” but that “[t]he next step. . . is to analyse a series of decisions and doctrines more rigorously,” and Koskenniemi takes that “next step,” analyzing recurrent doctrinal and theoretical “patterns” throughout From Apology.

533 Id. at 358.

534 KOSKENNIEMI, FROM APOLOGY, supra note 4, at 511–12.

535 David Kennedy, Theses, supra note 330, at 383.

536 KOSKENNIEMI, FROM APOLOGY, supra note 4, at 60.

537 David Kennedy, Theses, supra note 330, at 387.

538 Koskenniemi, Between Commitment and Cynicism, supra note 90.

539 David Kennedy, Theses, supra note 330, at 391.

540 See Section C. Ill., “‘Empty’ universalism”.

541 David Kennedy, Theses, supra note 330, at 367.
David Kennedy’s basic concept of international law as a “discourse” is arrived at by “crudely borrow[ing] from the field of structural linguistics”—from Saussure’s Course in General Linguistics.\textsuperscript{362} This generates a linguistic concept of international law as a “largely unconscious structure” which both controls and permits communication by the choice and recognition of the variable contents according to fixed patterns.\textsuperscript{363} For Kennedy this approach “can serve as the starting point for explanation of a theory of legal argument,”\textsuperscript{364} indeed, it seems to be Koskenniemi’s “starting point” in the introduction to From Apology.\textsuperscript{365} Kennedy expands, very modestly, on the concept of a “largely unconscious structure” in his 1985 “Critical Theory, Structuralism and Contemporary Legal Scholarship,”\textsuperscript{366} “barely acknowledg[ing] Lacan’s work” as “instructive for legal analysis,” as David S. Caudill puts it.\textsuperscript{367}

Echoing David Kennedy’s notion of a “largely unconscious structure,” Koskenniemi focuses on the “deep-structure” of international legal discourse.\textsuperscript{368} That “structure” is captured in Koskenniemi’s apology (concrete)/utopia (normative) analytic or, in Kennedy’s terms, in “the contradiction . . . between consent based norms which must be externally validated (or implied from ‘objective’ facts) and external norms which must be subjectively justified and defined.”\textsuperscript{369} This is a tension which, as Koskenniemi demonstrates in chapters five and six of From Apology, “cuts across all such traditional sources as treaties, custom, principles or the writings of judges or publicists.”\textsuperscript{370}

\textsuperscript{362} Id. at 374.
\textsuperscript{363} Id. at 375 (emphasis added).
\textsuperscript{364} Id. at 375.
\textsuperscript{365} Koskenniemi, From Apology, supra note 4, at 1-15.
\textsuperscript{367} Caudill, supra note 14, at 676, 679.
\textsuperscript{368} Koskenniemi, From Apology, supra note 4, at 6.
\textsuperscript{369} David Kennedy, Theses, supra note 330, at 370.
\textsuperscript{370} Id.
2. Rising and Falling

David Kennedy’s concept of an “unconscious structure” mirrors Duncan Kennedy’s concept of a “legal consciousness.” Duncan Kennedy developed this concept in The Rise and Fall of Classical Legal Thought—a book written in 1975, circulated at around that time within closed networks and Harvard Law School, but only published for a general audience in 2006—and he deploys it in “Blackstone’s Commentaries.”

According to Duncan Kennedy, Rise and Fall influenced “students and young colleagues [who] entered directly into the effort to reconstruct the structural transformations of legal discourse,” including David Kennedy. While he does not suggest that David Kennedy’s “Theses” was influenced by Rise and Fall and, similarly, David Kennedy does not cite Rise and Fall in “Theses,” for reasons set out in the preceding analysis, the idea of “reconstruct[ing] the structural transformations of legal discourse” permeates “Theses” and From Apology.

The parallels between Koskenniemi’s notion of a “deep-structure,” David Kennedy’s notion of a “largely unconscious structure,” and this definition, from Duncan Kennedy, of “legal consciousness” are striking:

[L]egal consciousness [is] an entity with a measure of autonomy. It is a set of concepts and intellectual operations that evolves according to a pattern of its own, and exercises an influence on results distinguishable from those of political power and economic interest. The autonomy of legal

\[\text{footnotes:}\]

\[\text{371} \quad \text{Duncan Kennedy, Blackstone’s Commentaries, supra note 339, at 220; Duncan Kennedy, The Rise and Fall of Classical Legal Thought xiv–xvii (2006).}\]

\[\text{372} \quad \text{Duncan Kennedy, Rise and Fall, supra note 371, at vii.}\]

\[\text{373} \quad \text{Id. at vii–viii, xl.}\]

\[\text{374} \quad \text{Id. at xli.}\]

\[\text{375} \quad \text{See id. at xliii n.41.}\]

\[\text{376} \quad \text{See id.}\]

\[\text{377} \quad \text{Koskenniemi, From Apology, supra note 4, at 6.}\]

\[\text{378} \quad \text{David Kennedy, Theses, supra note 330, at 375.}\]
consciousness is a premise; yet that autonomy is no more than relative.\textsuperscript{379}

The identification of a “legal consciousness” is predicated on the idea that “it is possible to isolate and describe the significant dimensions or aspects of the body of ideas through which lawyers experience legal issues.”\textsuperscript{380} This is a “descriptive”, synchronic, analytical, “native speaker” approach to law.\textsuperscript{381} It analyzes and describes a thing called law internally, through its language, ignoring and avoiding the possibilities and challenges of diachronic inquiry into law’s ontology, of inquiry into law from perspectives external to it.\textsuperscript{382}

The point [in \textit{Rise and Fall}] was not to convert the reader to belief in a theory called structuralism . . . . Rather it was to take very specific ideas from the literatures of structuralism and critical theory, revise them as seemed appropriate, and use them to illuminate, hopefully, specific aspects of legal discourse.\textsuperscript{383}

I want to focus on the notion of description here, given its psychoanalytic-linguistic connotations.\textsuperscript{384} To reveal those connotations I want to \textit{almost} break the word apart into

\begin{itemize}
\item \textsuperscript{379} Duncan Kennedy, \textit{Rise and Fall}, supra note 371, at 2.
\item \textsuperscript{380} Id. at 3.
\item \textsuperscript{381} See Duncan Kennedy, \textit{Blackstone’s Commentaries}, supra note 339, at 220–21 (“[W]hat I have to say is descriptive, and descriptive only of thought. It means ignoring the question of what brings a legal consciousness into being, what causes it to change, and what effect it has on the actions of those who live it.”). On synchrony and “native speaker” approaches, see supra Section B. III., “International law ‘as a language.’”
\item \textsuperscript{382} See Rasulov, supra note 13, at 643 (describing “the [From Apology] project [as one that] follows directly in the footsteps of what can be called the study of the inner life of the law tradition,” without tracing the internal or “inner” character of Koskenniemi’s work back to Duncan Kennedy’s thought – see infra note 411 on this point).
\item \textsuperscript{383} Duncan Kennedy, \textit{Rise and Fall}, supra note 371, at xiv.
\item \textsuperscript{384} See Caudill, supra note 14, at 661:
\begin{quote}
Whilst psychoanalysis can be viewed solely as an explanatory model for individual human behaviour, “it also contains the possibilities for an approach that analyses the mechanisms by which the social world enters into the experience of each individual, constructing the human ‘subject’ and reproducing itself through the perpetuation of particular patterns of ideology.”
\end{quote}
(\textit{quoting} Stephen Frosh, \textit{The Politics of Psychoanalysis: An Introduction to Freudian and Post-Freudian Thought} 11 (1987)).
\end{itemize}
de-scribe. “Scribing” is, of course, the process of writing. “De-scribing” is, then, a process of un-writing, of getting inside the text, of “providing an ‘insider’s view.’” It involves extraction of “specific aspects of legal discourse,” its “deep-structure,” through a process of de-construction, of taking apart, which leads to an understanding of how the discourse fits together.

This is the analytic methodology advocated by Duncan Kennedy in Rise and Fall, applied by Duncan Kennedy in “Blackstone’s Commentaries,” translated for an international legal audience by David Kennedy in “Theses,” and “received” by Koskenniemi in From Apology. A review of the literature on psychoanalysis would seem to be an essential part of any inquiry into “legal consciousness,” but Lacan and Freud are absent from Rise and Fall’s bibliography, and Duncan Kennedy defines “consciousness” without reference to their work:

> Consciousness refers to the total contents of a mind, including images of the external world, images of the self, of emotions, goals and values, and theories about the world and self. I use the term only in this vague, all-inclusive sense. It defines the universe within which are situated the more sharply-delineated concepts that are the vehicles for analysis.

This definition of “consciousness” in structuralist terms but without reference to Lacan, the principal theorist of structuralist psychoanalysis, reflects Caudill’s argument that “[c]ritical [t]heory and [s]tructuralism . . . are most often identified as the forerunners of critical legal scholarship,” obscuring the importance of psychoanalysis as one of the foundations of 386 Duncan Kennedy, Rise and Fall, supra note 371, at xiv.

---

388 Id. at 10 n.7. See also id. at 567 (referring to “[t]he descriptive thesis in From Apology to Utopia”). Desautels-Stein, Point of Attack, supra note 153, at 681, notes that “[i]n From Apology, Koskenniemi built a ‘classical’ structure of legal argument,” using “classical” in the sense of Duncan Kennedy’s Rise and Fall, supra note 371. Desautels-Stein does not, however, save for repeated references to “classical legal thought,” develop the point or trace the deeper methodological connections between Duncan Kennedy’s work and Koskenniemi’s thought.
390 Id. at 27.
critical legal studies (CLS), despite the fact that “both [critical theory and structuralism] signal a latent role for psychoanalytic theory in critical legal studies." If psychoanalysis features in CLS work only as “a series of suggestive traces,” then, in a sense, this Article produces a new reading of Koskenniemi’s CLS-inspired work by finding and linking those “traces.”

More generally, there is a cherry picking quality to Duncan Kennedy’s engagement with theory, methodology and philosophy. Kennedy explains “[t]he goal” of Rise and Fall as the “introdu[ction of] critical theory and structuralism, including the Frankfurt School and . . . the work of Clause Levi-Strauss and Jean Piaget, into American jurisprudence and legal sociology.” Theodor Adorno, Max Horkheimer and Walter Benjamin, three of the Frankfurt School’s leading lights, are, however, absent from a bibliography that, at five pages, is brief to the point of absurdity given Rise and Fall’s ambitious “goal.” Duncan Kennedy assumes that heterogeneous intellectual traditions—critical theory and structuralism—can be synchronically homogenized “in the analysis of law,” paying little attention to the distinct literatures that constitute each of those traditions.

Duncan Kennedy’s methodology advocates a structuralist concept of “consciousness” without reference to the literature on psychoanalysis, and an approach to theory, methodology and philosophy that is “vague” and homogenistically “all-inclusive.” Adopting that methodology, via David Kennedy’s “Theses,” Koskenniemi has, in From Apology, Gentle Civilizer and his later work analyzed above, written what can and should be read as a Lacanian psychoanalysis of international law without referring to Lacan.

---

391 Caudill, supra note 14, at 662.
392 Id. at 676.
393 See Alan Hunt, The Theory of Critical Legal Studies, 6 OXFORD J. LEG. STUD. 1, 23 (1986) (noting a CLS “tendency,” which he associates with Duncan Kennedy, “to cite the theoretical origins of their positions in a very loose way”). Koskenniemi notes the “review” of CLS in Hunt without analysis or discussion. Koskenniemi, FROM APOLOGY, supra note 4, at 63 n.151.
394 DUNCAN KENNEDY, RISE AND FALL, supra note 371, at ix.
396 DUNCAN KENNEDY, RISE AND FALL, supra note 371, at 265–69.
397 Id. at xiv.
398 See id. at xiv. See supra Section B. III., “International law ‘as a language,’” on synchrony. There is a general tendency in the literature on critical approaches to international law to synchronically homogenize structuralism and critical theory despite their distinctive natures. See, e.g., Singh, International legal positivism, supra note 186, at 299-300; Rasulov, supra note 13, at 655.
399 DUNCAN KENNEDY, RISE AND FALL, supra note 371, at 27.
The roots of Koskenniemi’s work in Duncan Kennedy’s thought have been hiding in plain sight. The notion of a movement “from apology to utopia” is at the heart of Duncan Kennedy’s Blackstone’s Commentaries and forms the title of Koskenniemi’s first book, and they have both written books that include “Rise and Fall” in their titles. While these might, at first glance, seem like insignificant, even trivial, coincidences or parallels, the analysis undertaken here reveals them to be anything but.

Koskenniemi has loomed large as the “master” of “critical” international legal scholarship and yet, because we have remained unconscious of the “priority” of a psychoanalytic reading of his work—something that this Article aims to remedy—we have described or, at best, de-scribed international law. We lack the ability and reject the possibility of fundamentally changing or re-imageining international law precisely because we have focused our energies on description. Our capacity to describe/de-scribe “legal consciousness”—our appreciation of and enthusiasm for “culture[s] of formalism”—has risen because our insight into the thinking that underpins that capacity has fallen. In recent debates on international legal theory, therefore, “les non-dupes errant”/“those who are not taken in [are seen to] err.”

---

400 See supra notes 342, 348 and accompanying text.

401 See DUNCAN KENNEDY, RISE AND FALL, supra note 371; Koskenniemi, Gentle Civilizer, supra note 6.

402 See supra Section A, “Introduction,” on “priority.”

403 As Hunt observes:

> The heart of [Duncan] Kennedy’s ‘antagonism to philosophy’ centres around the question of the abstract character of theory and philosophy. The objection against abstraction is that distancing and generalization sacrifices the particularity or specificity of reality. Thus, if the objective of thought is to understand and to change reality, ‘abstraction’ is seen as conflicting with this goal . . . . Kennedy is asserting the view that only those elements of a discourse which are capable of participating in ‘effective communication’ are to count as knowledge. This is a perfectly plausible position within philosophy, but it neither abolishes philosophy nor does it overcome his primary objection to abstraction. ‘Effective communication’ is not free of abstraction, but rather it privileges those abstractions that are part of ‘common sense’ or ordinary discourse.

Hunt, The Theory of Critical Legal Studies, supra note 393, at 27. See Nicholson, supra note 20, on “re-imageination.”

404 See supra notes 2, 3 and accompanying text.
apparently synchronic, not diachronic. It apparently involves the production of reality "affect[s]" through the de-scription of international law's content from inside its structure, rather than any attempt to change that structure from the outside.

3. An Unconscious Language Structure

To recap, and in summary, Koskenniemi’s work is, for the reasons outlined in this Section, based on his adoption and application of David Kennedy’s “analytic approach” in “Theses.” It can and should be read as Lacanian for all of the reasons outlined throughout this Article, but most especially because David Kennedy’s and Koskenniemi’s shared and fundamental notion of a “largely unconscious [international legal] structure,” within which the problems which modern lawyers face, either in theory or in doctrine, are constituted, originating out of Duncan Kennedy’s concept of “legal consciousness,” is synonymous with Lacan’s twin claims that “every discourse derives its effects from the unconscious,” and that “the unconscious is structured as a language.”

That synonymy is neither coincidental nor accidental—synonymy is not to be confused with similarity. It is a product of the fact that David Kennedy and Koskenniemi, drawing, ultimately, on Duncan Kennedy’s work, base their inquiry into international law’s structure on the intellectual foundations of Lacan’s work, on Levi-Strauss’ structuralist anthropology and Saussure’s structuralist theory of linguistics (see parts II and III above). On this foundation Koskenniemi erects a theory of international legal practice, using Laclau’s Lacanian theory of hegemony for support.

---

405 For discussions of synchrony and diachrony, and internal and external perspectives, see supra Section B. III., “International law ‘as a language.’”

406 See Anne Orford, In Praise of Description, 25 LEIDEN J. INT’L L. 609 (2012); Martti Koskenniemi, Celebrating Structuralism, supra note 241, at 732 (“The task of legal research would be to understand legal professionalism not just be examining what institutions say but what makes them choose from equally plausible alternatives the ones they do, and draw from them the conclusions they draw” – emphasis in original).

407 David Kennedy, Theses, supra note 330, at 375.

408 Koskenniemi, FROM APOLOGY, supra note 4, at 6.

409 Lacan, Subversion, supra note 63, at 701.

411 Rasulov maintains that From Apology’s “intellectual genealogy” is not rooted in Duncan Kennedy’s work but in “the French structuralist tradition” and, in particular, the work of Levi-Strauss and Michel Foucault. See Rasulov, supra note 13, at 649–51. For the reasons set out in this Section and, more generally, throughout this Article, it is possible, via Lacan and psychoanalysis, to link “the French structuralist tradition” with Duncan Kennedy and critical legal studies more generally and, to that extent, I disagree with Rasulov.

Like David Kennedy, Koskenniemi starts with Lacan’s forebears—Levi-Strauss and Saussure—and comes (unlike Kennedy) to rely on Ernesto Laclau, one of Lacan’s principal followers. The fact that he works with Lacan’s major forebears and follower but not with Lacan himself is traceable to his adoption of Duncan Kennedy’s methodology (see the immediately preceding Section, “Rising and falling”). Koskenniemi’s work can and should be read as a de-scription of international law’s (linguistic) “unconscious” that is (unconsciously) based on Lacan’s insistence that “the unconscious is structured as a language” and that “words are the only material of the unconscious.”

Lacanian psychoanalysis is, for these reasons, the “political unconscious” of and “allegorical key” to Koskenniemi’s work.

D. Prognosis

I. Therapeutic Benefits: The Work of the “Master”

I agree with Aristodemou that international law has largely overcome its late twentieth-century “apologetics, restorative rhetoric and self-abnegating excuses” to become “a ubiquitous presence in [early twenty-first century] global policy making,” a “discourse that is ‘hard to escape.’” For me, unlike Aristodemou, however, the “sudden embrace, adulation, and self-congratulation amongst and for public international lawyers” after a period of sustained, even neurotic, “diffidence and self-questioning,” is linked and even largely attributable to Koskenniemi’s Lacanian psychoanalysis of international law and its reality “affect” on international law(yers).

The International Law Commission’s work on the fragmentation of international law is perhaps the best example of the beneficial effect of Koskenniemi’s psychoanalytic therapy on international law’s state of mind and self-confidence. In response to a widespread, late-twentieth-century belief that international law was fragmenting into disparate elements, each focused on a distinct area of policy—human rights, the global environment, 413 Lacan, Of Structure, supra note 96.

---

414 JAMESON, POLITICAL UNCONSCIOUS, supra note 24, at 13.

416 Id. at 36.
international trade, for example—the International Law Commission embarked on a study of fragmentation and possible responses to it.\(^{417}\)

The latter stages of that study were led by Koskenniemi and he produced an “analytical study”—perhaps “psychoanalytical study” would have been more apt—explaining the study group’s conclusions.\(^{418}\) The “study” reads like an executive summary of From Apology and Gentle Civilizer.\(^{419}\) Recalling the discussion of Hegemony and Socialist Strategy above, it amounts to an affirmation of hegemonic practice as the response to “fault[s],” “fissure[s]” and fragmentation in the “normal historical development” international law had envisioned for itself.\(^{420}\)

International law is, according to the “study”, not fragmented but a synchronic “language . . . a total system . . . complete at every moment”.\(^{421}\) “Although there may be disagreement among lawyers about just how the systemic relationship between the various decisions, rules and principles should be conceived, there is seldom disagreement that it is one of the tasks of legal reasoning to establish it.”\(^{422}\) Legal practice is a political endeavor, fashioning coherence out of the seemingly incoherent:

Legal interpretation, and thus legal reasoning, builds systemic relationships between rules and principles by envisaging them as parts of some human effort or \(^{417}\) See Martineau, supra note 13, for an overview of fragmentation and the ILC’s work. I have addressed fragmentation in previous work – see Nicholson, supra note 20.

\(^{418}\) See Report of the International Law Commission on the Work of Its Fifty-Eighth Session, U.N. Doc A/61/10, at 402 (2006) (“The Study Group . . . emphasized that [its] conclusions had to be read in connection with the analytical study, finalized by the Chairperson [Martti Koskenniemi], on which they are based.”).

\(^{419}\) See Report of the Study Group, supra note 247. See also Martti Koskenniemi & Päivi Leino, Fragmentation of International Law? Postmodern Anxieties, 15 LEIDEN J. INT’L’L 553, 578-579 (2002) (foreshadowing the outcome of the ILC’s work in its conclusion that while “no overall solution” is available to resolve fragmentation anxieties “consensual formalism” is the way forward).

\(^{420}\) See text accompanying supra notes 156 and 157. My reading of the ILC’s fragmentation work as consistent with Koskenniemi’s work in general conflicts with the existing literature. See Sahib Singh, The Potential of International Law: Fragmentation and Ethics, 24 LEIDEN J. INT’L’L 23 (2011) (suggesting there is an inconsistency between Koskenniemi’s scholarly work and the ILC study); Maksymilian Del Mar, Systems Values and Understanding Legal Language, 21 LEIDEN J. INT’L’L 29 (2008). Del Mar critiques the ILC study for ‘taking “the law itself” as an object’, arguing for an approach based on ‘the use of the language of law as a resource in the exercise of judgement’. Id. at 34, 48. See also Broude, supra note 13; Murphy, supra note 13. Broude and Murphy point to but do not fully explore the connection between Koskenniemi’s scholarship and his ILC fragmentation work.

\(^{421}\) JAMESON, PRISON-HOUSE, supra note 1, at 5–6.

\(^{422}\) Report of the Study Group, supra note 247, at 23.
purpose... it may... be rationalized in terms of a political obligation on law-appliers to make their decisions cohere with the preferences and expectations of the community whose law they administer.\footnote{Id. at 24 (citation omitted).}

The “good” served by legal reasoning is, consistent with the “culture of formalism,” an “empty” universal. Hence the “principle of systemic integration” in Article 31(3)(c) of the Vienna Convention on the Law of Treaties:\footnote{Vienna Convention on the Law of Treaties, art. 31(3), 1155 U.N.T.S. 331 ("There shall be taken into account, together with the context: ... (c) any relevant rules of international law applicable in the relations between the parties.").}

\begin{quote}
The principle of systemic integration... looks beyond the individual case. By making sure that the outcome is linked to the legal environment, and that adjoining rules are considered... any decision also articulates the legal-institutional environment in view of substantive preferences, distributionary choices and political objectives... Without the principle of “systemic integration” it would be impossible to give expression to and to keep alive, any sense of the common good of humankind, not reducible to the good of any particular institutions or ‘regime.’\footnote{Report of the Study Group, supra note 247, at 244.}
\end{quote}

Koskenniemi’s psychoanalytic approach to international law was uniquely well-equipped to address the “phallic” nature of fragmentation. As Deborah Luepnitz explains, “Lacan observed that many human beings use the penis to cover their pervasive sense of bodily lack, and so he chose the term ‘phallus’ to refer to our wish for completeness. The phallus therefore signifies, paradoxically, the opposition of completeness—that is, lack.”\footnote{Deborah Luepnitz, Beyond the Phallus: Lacan and Feminism, in THE CAMBRIDGE COMPANION TO LACAN 221, 226 (Jean-Michel Rabaté ed., 2003).} Fragmentation is international law’s “phallic” complex—an expression of its unfulfillable “wish for completeness”—and it gave the (Lacanian) “master” the perfect opportunity to demonstrate his mastery.
II. Utopian “Archaeologies of the [International Legal] Future.”

In this Article, I have undertaken a diachronic analysis of Martti Koskenniemi’s work, an “intellectual [re]construction” of his writings from the “outside.” I have tried to avoid the perspective of the “dupe,” to be one of “les non-dupes,” to resist the master’s reality “affect,” without “err[ing]” by “dismiss[ing]” international law’s symbolic texture—its discourse—as a mere semblance, and without being “blind to its efficacy . . . to the way we can intervene in the Real through [international law’s] symbolic discourse.”

A synchronic methodology, a psychoanalytic de-cription of the subject’s place within his structure, reproduces the fundamental structures of the past in an “eternal present.” Past and present are synchronized in a denial of even the possibility of a future; a denial of any future that is not synchronous with a present which demands that the past synchronize with it, in an “insurrection of the present against [all] other temporalities.”

Koskenniemi’s psychoanalytic, structuralist, synchronic account of international law is, therefore, in the most fundamental, ontological-methodological sense, a denial of the possibility of significant change in the structure of international law. It is erotic; it is in

428 See supra Section B. III., “International law ‘as a language.’”

430 Žižek, Less Than Nothing, supra note 3, at 971:

[From a properly Lacanian standpoint, les non-dupes errant means [that] . . . the true illusion consists not in taking symbolic semblances as real, but in substantializing the Real itself, in taking the Real as a substantial In-itself and reducing the symbolic to a mere texture of semblances. In other words, those who err are precisely those cynics [see Koskenniemi, Between Commitment and Cynicism, supra note 90] who dismiss the symbolic texture as a mere semblance and are blind to its efficacy, to the way the symbolic affects the Real, to the way we can intervene in the Real through the symbolic.

431 See supra Section C. VII. 2, “Rising and falling” (on “de-cription”).

433 Id. at 10 (quoting and translating the title of Alexander Kluge, Der Angriff der Gegenwart gegen die übrige Zeit (1985)).

434 See Jameson, Archaeologies of the Future, supra note 427, at xii (”[T]o adapt Mrs Thatcher’s famous dictum, there is no alternative to Utopia, and late capitalism seems to have no natural enemies . . . . What is crippling is love with the structures and myths of international legal discourse, with an image of the international lawyer as a sutured hegemon, and with (what it sees as) the beautiful truth of international law. The notion that Koskenniemi’s work takes us on a “voyage” towards utopia must, therefore, be rejected. His work, in common with fundamental trends in late-twentieth- and early-twenty-first-century thought that accept capitalism as the final system, has effectively abandoned a (diachronic) future and the possibility of (legal-) utopian visions of it.

not the presence of an enemy but rather the universal belief... that no other socio-economic system is conceivable, let alone practically available.”); see also Kotiaho, A Return to Koskenniemi, supra note 26, at 494 (asking whether “Koskenniemi’s project is an attack on international law at all,” answering “[n]o”, and linking “[t]he left-wing international legal project” with an appreciation that “from behind the corner of theoretical eclecticism, one can already hear the co-optive song of the sirens of global capitalism.”).

See Freud, Pleasure Principle, supra note 294, at 42–43 (“[T]he efforts of Eros to combine organic substances into ever larger unities”); id. at 50 (“the Eros of the poets and philosophers which holds all living things together”); id. at 46 (“Eros, the preserve of all things”); id. at 54 (“Eros, the preserver of life.”).

See WALTER BENJAMIN, THE ORIGIN OF GERMAN TRAGIC DRAMA 31 (John Osborne trans., 1998)

If truth is described as beautiful, this must be understood in the context of the Symposium with its description of the stages of erotic desires. Eros—it should be understood—does not betray his basic impulse by directing his longings towards the truth; for truth is beautiful: not so much in itself, as for Eros.

See generally Orford, A Journal of the Voyage from Apology to Utopia, supra note 217.

See JAMESON, ARCHAEOLOGIES OF THE FUTURE, supra note 427, at xii. Compare Lang and Marks, supra note 222, at 447–48 (“[Koskenniemi’s] project is not one of revival, but one of renewal and reimagination.”). Whatever (limited) possibility Koskenniemi’s “project” holds for “renewal and reimagination” is, as argued throughout this Article, limited to what can be achieved by hegemonic legal practice by “sutured” subjects situated within an international legal discourse defined by a synchronic history of its present, and it is this ontology of international law which, I argue, needs to be challenged. Lang and Marks seem to cautiously acknowledge the need for such a challenge but their reservations about Koskenniemi’s “project” are rooted in the “voluntarism” they associate with his work. By contrast, my analysis of structure, hegemony, and suture in Koskenniemi’s work has sought to demonstrate the predominantly anti-voluntarist character of Koskenniemi’s, on my reading, psychoanalytic-structuralist scholarship:

[Koskenniemi] has sought to recapture what he takes to have been an earlier commitment to responsible moral agency. We have noted that in a different time and place and in a different disciplinary context, E.P. Thompson likewise evoked the moralized sensibility of an earlier epoch... [through] veneration of heroic agency and self-creation... The poetry of voluntarism is certainly an inspiring art. What is less certain is how well it equips us to pursue the kinds of projects that might one day make us authors of our collective mode of existence as a whole.
The most urgent project in international legal thinking is, in my view, a recovery of the “utopian impulse,” an “archaeology” of international law’s future, a diachronic construction of international law’s future using “fragments” of the past. That recovery is impossible for so long as the international lawyer qua hegemonic subject remains alive as the subjectivity that international lawyers are required or expected to adopt when they suture themselves into international legal discourse.

Diachrony and the recovery of the “utopian impulse” imply anti-erotic, destructive, anti-structuralist, anti-hegemonic, anti-discourse kinds of thinking; a process of “intellectual construction” out of the “ruins,” the “fragments” of the collapsing structure, in

Id. at 453. See also Haskell, supra note 29, at 675 (“[T]he miscalculation in [From Apology’s] polemic to the profession is that it misses out... on the extra-linguistic rhetorical practices required to protect and expand intellectual terrain.”).

See generally id.

See WALTER BENJAMIN, ORIGIN, supra note 436, at 29 (“The value of fragments of thought is all the greater the less direct their relationship to the underlying idea, and the brilliance of the representation depends as much on this value as the brilliance of the mosaic does on the quality of the glass paste.”); see also Nicholson, supra note 20 (on Benjamin and “fragments”).

See Haskell, supra note 29, at 676 (protesting against current formulations of the international lawyer’s subjectivity by calling on international lawyers to “[leave] the humanist impulse to moralize, to speak of transhistorical sensibilities, to confine ourselves as lawyers to the role of mediating professional differences or political hostilities, and instead to seek out the ruthlessly anti-transcendental, almost inhuman mechanisms that rein us into subjectivities”).

See Balakrishnan Rajagopal, Counter-hegemonic International Law: rethinking human rights and development as a Third World strategy, 27 THIRD WORLD Q. 767, 780 (2006) (“[W]e must start by fundamentally rethinking the shibboleths of the past, especially those that have provided the language of emancipation and justice.”).

See WALTER BENJAMIN, THE ARCADES PROJECT 460 (Howard Eiland & Kevin McLaughlin trans., 2002) (“[T]he rags, the refuse—these I will not inventory but allow, in the only way possible, to come into their own: by making use of them.”). Freud develops an analogy between the mind and urban architecture. See FREUD, CIVILIZATION AND ITS DISCONTENTS, supra note 294, at 6–8. He also asks, with reference to Plato, whether “living substance at the time of its coming to life was torn apart into small particles, which have ever since endeavoured to reunite through the sexual instincts” and whether “these splintered fragments of living substance... havel] attained a multicellular condition... finally transferred the instinct for reuniting, in the most highly concentrated form, to the germ-cells.” Id. at 52. Walter Benjamin, writing in 1925 (Fried writes Civilization in 1920), explores the unification of fragments in “mosaic[s]” and within a platonic framework of base “phenomena,” mediating “concepts,” and “ideas.” See WALTER BENJAMIN, ORIGIN, supra note 436, at 29, 30–32, 33–34. See also, on Benjamin’s Platonism, Beatrice Hanssen, Philosophy at Its Origin: Walter Benjamin’s Prologue to the Ursprung des deutschen opposition to erotic labors-of-love that synchronically re-enforce it. It is time to think positively about collapse into “the void,” about death as re-birth. It is time to think against our identity as “native language-speaker[s] of international law,” against ourselves. Only after the death of the image of international law’s much venerated

Trauerspiels 110 Modern Language Notes 809 (1995). Žižek contemplates a “return to Plato” with reference to Plato’s “idea” and on the basis that “everything that appears ultimately appears out of nothing.” Žižek, LESS THAN NOTHING, supra note 3, at 37, 41. Nicholson contemplates a negative theory of international law and international legal practice based on Benjamin’s platonic framework. See generally Nicholson, supra note 20.

See Mills, supra note 293, at 378:

Under the pressure of disturbing external forces, a drive becomes an urge or pulsion to repeat itself, the motive of which is to return to an earlier state of undifferentiation, the ‘expression of the inertia inherent in organic life’ . . . . Because drives are ‘conservative,’ that is, they follow a conservative economy of regulatory energy, are acquired historically and phylogenetically in the species, and tend toward restorative processes that maintain their original uncomplicated immediacy, Freud speculates that an ‘elementary living entity’ would have no desire to change, only to maintain its current mode of existence.

(Quoting Freud, Pleasure Principle, supra note 294, at 36, 38).

See Mills, supra note 293, at 379:

According to Freud, all living organisms die for ‘internal reasons,’ that is, death is brought about from the cessation of internally derived activity: death is not merely executed by an extraneous force, rather it is activated by endogenous motives . . . the psyche is given determinate degrees of freedom to ‘follow its own path to death’ . . . that is, to bring about its end fashioned by its own hands. But this end is actually a return to its beginning, a recapitulating, a recapitulation or its quiescent inorganic immediacy.

(Quoting Freud, Pleasure Principle, supra note 294, at 38, 39).

Koskenniemi, FROM APOLOGY, supra note 4, at 568.

Theodor W. Adorno, NEGATIVE DIALECTICS 365 (E.B. Ashton trans., 2007) (1966) (“If thinking is to be true—if it is to be true today, in any case—it must also be a thinking against itself.”). On “thinking against” in international law see Nicholson, supra note 20.
“Gentle Civilizer’s” past and present will we be able to make “progress and [secure] the production of new [international legal] forms.” To build any future worth the name we must first rediscover (legal) means of imagining one.

Fuseli’s Artist Moved by the Grandeur of Ancient Ruins shows a figure in a state of utter dejection dwarfed and enclosed by selected bits of a colossus, which though larger and more powerful than he, is in its dismemberment equally ineffectual. The past is conceived as a figure or being, now reduced to abstraction or monstrosity. The artist is part and not part of the collapse: his posture echoes the cascading form familiar in many scenes of ruin, but for all his solidarity with the fallen giant he remains apart, neither buried nor assimilated, reveling now in a fit of melancholy which will pass.

451 Freud, Pleasure Principle, supra note 294, at 37 (“[I]n addition to the conservative instincts which impel towards repetition, there may be other which push forward towards progress and the production of new forms.”). See also id. at 57–58:

The pleasure principle [or Eros] seems actually to serve the death instincts. It is true that it keeps watch upon stimuli from without, which are regarded as dangers by both kinds of instincts; but it is more especially on guard against increases of stimulation from within, which would make the task of living more difficult. . . . We must be ready . . . to abandon a path that we have followed for a time, if it seems to be leading to no good end. Only believers, who demand that science shall be a substitute for the catechism they have given up, will blame an investigator for developing or even transforming his views.

452 See Nicholson, supra note 20.